But isn't Russia behind the United States in number and variety of atomic weapons? Would not this indicate that, from Russia's viewpoint, it would be better for tests to continue, so she could catch up? What is the advantage that Russia sees in agitating for an end to tests? Just what is the Kremlin's game?

Here is the answer given by one American analyst:

"To anyone not blinded by wishful thinking, the basic motives of current Russian tactics seem quite clear. They grow out of the simple fact that all of the Soviets' aggressive aims could be achieved more easily if they encountered no nuclear opposition.

"The Soviets, therefore, have every reason to stop all testing and development of nuclear weapons. Look what they could gain thereby:

"First, halting tests would slow or stop the development of nuclear weapons which could be used defensively by the United States against missile attack. This would insure the continued vulnerability of America to nuclear attack.

"Second, by blocking the use of nuclear weapons Russia would free its own superior conventional forces for blackmail or military aggression.

"Third, Russia would slow the spread of nuclear weapons to other nations on which it has designs, and thus hamper their resistance to bullying tactics of aggression. What if there had been a way to arm the Hungarians with nuclear weapons in their revolt?

"Fourth, ending tests would stop our development of 'discriminate' nuclear weapons—clean ones which could be used in limited wars against minor Communist aggressions.

"Even if the United States remained technically ahead on nuclear weapons, such an edge would have no significance so long as the Soviets gained tactical advantages of the kind just listed."

Assuming that the spread and development of nuclear weapons cannot be stopped, as these experts believe: Who suffers the most thereby?

Here is one analyst's answer on that:

"Of course, the spread of nuclear weapons to other powers has disadvantages for both Russia and the United States. But, on balance, the Soviets have much more to lose thereby than we. The Soviets, in their aggressions, would be forced to move much more cautiously in the face of possible opposition by nuclear weapons. The United States, with no aggressive aims, would not have this problem.

"If the spread of nuclear weapons is inevitable, slowing it down is clearly to the Soviets' gain."

WITH BETTER MISSILES, MORE DANGER

What about missiles?

Most analysts agree with this man's size-up:

"It is in missiles that the armament race really centers now. We already have the nuclear warheads on hand. As you improve the means of delivering those warheads to their targets, the danger of nuclear war increases.

"Also, with missiles, the potentialities of nuclear blackmail become enormous. A powerful nation can be held in terror of a sudden surprise attack for which there is, so far, no defense—only retaliation.

"When it comes to blackmail, the Russians have a tremendous advantage over the United States, or any other free and democratic nation. Dictators are able to threaten and blackmail far more effectively because they don't have to be concerned about the morality of their acts or the attitudes of the voters.

"Can you imagine President Eisenhower threatening to create a nuclear holocaust over Berlin or Formosa? Yet the Soviets did this over Suez, when Britain and France attempted to move in there in 1956. And this year they appeared to be doing it again over Berlin. Khrushchev, just a few days ago, declared that Russia has enough nuclear-armed rockets 'to raze to the ground all of our potential enemies.'"

On missiles, though, the United States is considered to be behind, Russia is conceded a lead. Then why doesn't Russia agitate for an end to missile tests, instead of an end to nuclear tests, in order to freeze its missile advantage and keep the United States from catching up?

In answer to this question, you get from some experts another question:

"Suppose Russia gets an agreement with the United States to halt nuclear tests and then follows up by proposing an end to missile tests. Would the United States be in a position to accept that challenge—and thus accept a permanent disadvantage in missiles? Yet, if the United States refused, Russia would then have the same propaganda advantage on the missiles issue that it has had on the nuclear-test issue."

Then there's this question: Can the development of missiles really be stopped, any more than you can stop the development of nuclear weapons?

Key analysts say: "No. What you are really up against is the impossibility of stopping human thought.

"Who is going to keep Communist China, as one example, from driving ahead to develop these weapons? Who is able to police China's vast territory to make sure that this is not being done? If Communist China gets such weapons, is it likely that India will be willing to overlook the dangers involved?"

This further point is made: John Foster Dulles, as Secretary of State, was guided by one simple conclusion—that the United States cannot be secure so long as a dictator rules a powerful nation, heavily armed and operating in secrecy behind an iron curtain.

It is reported that the late Senator Brian McMahon, who was chairman of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy when Russia acquired the atom bomb, wrote to the then President Harry S. Truman, warning him of the dangers that this development generated. According to these reports, Senator McMahon urged that the United States should tell Russia either to agree to an effective plan for control of atomic weapons or to expect attack. This suggestion was not followed.

Today, weapons are much more powerful than then, the ability to develop these weapons is widely dispersed through the world, and no real chance is seen of stopping this development.

Then what is the answer? Is there any alternatives to the prospect, for the United States, of surrendering or fighting a nuclear war in which there is grave danger of defeat?

It is here that you run into a sharp difference in official views.

View 1: This is the present official view of the White House and the Department of State. It is based on the concept that you can do business with Soviet Russia, that it is possible to reach agreements which will permit a stopping of nuclear tests and then lead to gradual disarmament.

It is in keeping with this view that the United States is now negotiating with Soviet Russia and Great Britain at Geneva, seeking a formula for effective inspection and enforcement of an agreement to halt bomb tests.

It is recognized by the U.S. Government that halting tests is of itself no disarmament move. But the hope is that an agreement on tests will be a first step, that, if mutual confidence and cooperation can be established in this field, then further steps toward actual disarmament can follow. This is the real meaning of the Geneva talks.

View 2: This is largely a military view. It rests upon evidence of rapid expansion of the Soviets' missile capacity and recurring new evidence of the Soviets' threatening policy of expansion.

Said an exponent of this view:

"The only solution, it seems to me, is for the United States to get into this arms race with both feet and win it. And to tell the Russians frankly what you are doing. Leave them in no doubt about your determination.

"The main element in our weakness has been the lack of determination—determination to stand up to Khrushchev every time he makes a threatening move. This is not advocating preventive war. It is just advocating a realistic view of the world situation. It is facing up to the fact that, the way things are going, the United States some day is likely to be faced with the choice of fighting or surrendering under threat of nuclear destruction."

View 3: This view is tending to grow among those in Government—both military and civilian—who are closest to strategic problems. It is a pessimistic view: That it is impossible for the United States to overtake the Soviet advantage in missiles without an all-out effort. But that, instead of making this all-out effort, the United States is tending to restrict its arms effort in the interest of avoiding a rise in Government spending and an increase in taxes.

The position that Soviet Russia holds in the arms race is encouraging her to be bold in her maneuvers abroad. The policy of deterrence by a "balance of terror" is seen as losing its effectiveness as Russia's missile capabilities increase. The possibilities for Russia to impose its will upon the United States by nuclear blackmail are seen as growing enormously, in a situation where she holds an arsenal of missiles against which there is, so far, no real defense.

This warning is being heard with increasing frequency: If the United States fails to realize what is happening, and prefers to take the easy road, she may find the power balance tilting so far in Russia's direction that it cannot be righted in time. It is then that a Soviet dictator most probably would issue his challenge.

All this is why the optimism that is so widespread with the American public appears not to be shared by many of those whose business it is to assess the U.S. future.

The two reports that follow, each made independently, bear on this whole problem:

"WHY RUSSIA WOULD RISK NUCLEAR WAR ON UNITED STATES—WILL THE THREAT OF NUCLEAR RETALIATION BY UNITED STATES REALLY DETER RUSSIA FROM A SURPRISE ATTACK ON THIS COUNTRY?—A STUDY OF NUCLEAR WAR AND ITS PROBABLE EFFECTS SUGGESTS THAT RUSSIA WOULD BE WILLING TO RUN THE RISK

"(Herman Kahn, an experienced analyst of defense problems, warns that Russia may not share the view that a nuclear war is too horrible to contemplate—or consider a surprise attack on the United States as too dangerous to attempt. Herman Kahn is a physicist. For 5 years, as an employee of the Rand Corp., he has been making studies of strategic systems of defense, mostly for the U.S. Air Force. Mr. Kahn, 37, was educated at the University of California at Los Angeles and at California Institute of Technology. Mr. Kahn's views are based on intensive studies with the Rand Corp. and at the Center of International Studies at Princeton University. In these studies, Mr. Kahn has had access to much official information. The following excerpts are from an article by Mr. Kahn in the Stanford Research Institute Journal for the fourth quarter of 1959, released on December 8. That article summarizes a book by Mr. Kahn, 'Three Lectures on Thermonuclear War,' which is to be published next spring by the Princeton University Press.)

"(By Herman Kahn)

"We are now entering the 15th year of the nuclear era. We are becoming increasingly aware that much is still to be learned about the likely effects of a nuclear war and the conduct of international relations in a world in which force is tending to be increasingly less usable. Basic foreign policies formulated earlier in the nuclear era require review and examination.

"First, and perhaps most important, doubt has been cast recently on the widely accepted theory that existence of nuclear weapons has created a reliable balance of terror. The theory most commonly held indicates that a thermonuclear war would mean certain and automatic annihilation of both antagonists, if not the end of civilization.

"In many ways, this concept has been comforting. It makes plausible that, as soon as governments are informed of the terrible consequences of a nuclear war, they will realize that there could be no victors and, therefore, no sense to such a war; therefore, no sane leader would ever start one. Hence the hope that the very violence of war would deter it.

"Many proponents of the mutual-annihilation view believe that it is important to emphasize the horror and impracticability of thermonuclear war in order to establish the urgent necessity to settle our differences by peaceful means and to remove temptation from adventurers.

"The success of such a program depends on the fears thus generated being mutual and reliable. * * * The mutual-annihilation theory can be successful in forestalling an all-out nuclear attack only if both sides completely accept it.

"If only the West buys it and because of this drops it guard, the negligence can be incredibly dangerous. Even mutual belief in the automatic-annihilation theory can still lead to trouble. It is an open invitation to blackmail of the Munich type.

"Therefore, to the extent that the theory may not be true—or the Communists think it isn't—we should not weaken ourselves to the point where we are courting either 'Pearl Harbors' or 'Munichs.' It is important to understand this problem objectively even if analyses aimed at doing so give an impression of callousness.

"The mutual-annihilation view is not unique to the West. Malenkov [former Soviet Premier Georgi M. Malenkov] introduced it in the Soviet Union several years ago. * * * A different view seems to have been held by Khrushchev and the Soviet military. They agreed that war would be horrible, but argued that this was no reason for the Soviet Union to drop its guard—that, with sufficient preparations, only the capitalists would be destroyed. With some modifications their views seem to have prevailed.

"So much depends on this notion of the balance of terror. Is it really true? Would only an insane man initiate a thermonuclear war? Or, are there circumstances in which a nation's leaders might rationally decide that a thermonuclear war would be the most preferable of the possible alternatives?

"Perhaps, not surprisingly, one can conclude on examination that, with current technology, there are plausible, even probable, circumstances in which the leaders of a country might decide that war was the best alternative. Equally unsurprising, many people get very annoyed or angry at anyone making such a statement, although recognition of a situation is not necessarily endorsing it.

"To indicate how this conclusion about the feasibility of thermonuclear war was reached, it is necessary to describe a thermonuclear war and the kinds of risks that can arise against which the decision makers must compare the alternatives of going to war and not going to war.

"What all-out war would be like

"Genetic effects: Many biologists and geneticists are worried about the genetic effects of even the peacetime testing of nuclear weapons: some even talk as if the future of the human race is being jeopardized by exploding a few bombs a year in the Pacific Ocean or the Soviet Arctic. It is certainly true that a lot of bombs exploded inside a country would be far more dangerous than a few exploded farther away. But would it be cataclysmic?

"Calculations in this field are inherently uncertain. In addition, experimental evidence is insufficient to be conclusive about some of the important effects. One can, however, make orienting studies. One study indicated that the survivors of the war might average about 200 or 300 roentgens of radiation to their reproductive organs before age 30. This is an enormous amount of radiation. It is about 1,000 or 2,000 times as much as people in the United States would receive as a byproduct of the test program. It is about 50 to 100 times as much as they would normally get from natural sources. It is a large and frightening dose. It would result in much damage, but there is no evidence that it would be annihilating.

"If present beliefs are correct, the most serious genetic effect of this amount of radiation would be to raise the number of children born seriously defective about 25 percent, or from the current 4 to a new level of 5 percent of the total. This is a large penalty to pay for a war, and, more horrible still, one might have to continue to pay a similar though smaller price for 20 or 30 or 40 generations, but it is still far from annihilation. * * *

"Medical problems: There are medical problems other than the genetic ones, for example, the bone cancers and leukemias that might be caused by strontium-90, and the other life-shortening effects of the internal and external radiation from fission products.

"Here, again, examination indicates that, while the problems are horrible, they may well be within the range we are accustomed to. * * *

"The situation devolves to this: More and closer bombs will cause more trouble than fewer and further ones—but not necessarily that much more. If a country is hit hard—hundreds of bombs more or less on target—but people take advantage of the moderate protection that is available in existing buildings and take other simple measures—things which the Russians, for example, seem to be doing or thinking of doing, today—then both the long- and short-term effects of fall-out are mitigated drastically. With such preparations and some advance warning (the more preparation the less warning is needed) most people can survive the short-term fallout effects. The long-term effects are less avoidable. The war might result in an average life shortening of less than 1 or 2 years, for those who were lucky, and 5 or 10 for those who were not. In any case, life will go on.

"Economic recuperation also looks more feasible than is generally supposed. Most people—laymen and some experts—looking at the highly integrated character of a modern economy, argue that a nation is like a body; destroy the heart or other vital organs, and the body dies. * * *

"This view is questionable. Suppose the United States were divided into two countries—an A country with the largest 50 to 100 cities, and a B country the remainder. The A country cannot survive without a B country, but the B country, as far as we can see, can survive without the A country. Further, B has the resources and skills needed to rebuild A in, say, 10 years. In other words, a country should not be considered analogous to a body, but rather considered as two semi-independent pieces that trade with each other.

"Further, it is possible, by utilizing existing construction and otherwise improvising fallout protection to prepare the B country to receive evacuees from the A country and protect them reasonably satisfactorily. If preparations have been made, then, for most of the year, either the Soviets or the United States could improvise fallout protection on just days' or hours' notice. * * *

"Current (1958) Russian civil defense manuals indicate that they are making such preparations. In addition, the Russians claim to have given every adult in Russia something between 20 and 40 hours of instructions in civil defense followed by a compulsory examination. Perhaps most important of all, their program seems to include preparations for evacuation to improvised fallout protection.

"How effective would such an evacuation be?

"About 50 million Russians live in the largest 135 Soviet cities. If they evacuated, say, 80 percent of these 50 million to their B country and left the remainder to operate the cities, all essential functions would be maintained while exposing only about 10 million citizens. Also, having evacuated most of the urban population, it would be possible to evacuate those remaining comparatively easily.

"As long as our ICBM (intercontinental ballistic missile) force is small they don't even have to do the evacuation before they launch an attack. They have time to do so before our retaliatory bomber force reaches the majority of these cities.

"Under these circumstances, if the Russians strike first and are reasonably successful, our attack should kill not more than 5 or 10 million Russians, probably much less, unless things go incredibly badly for them. Thus, they might lose only a fraction as many people as they lost in World War II.

"Calling a Soviet bluff

"In some tense situation the Soviets could deliberately evacuate their A country in order to put the pressure on us. By this they make it credible that they intend to go to war unless we back down. While this gives us a sort of warning, we may not act on the warning. We may resolutely refuse to be "bluffed." In any case, unless we are willing to accept a Soviet retaliatory blow, the only practicable counteraction we may have might well be to back down or to put our SAC (Strategic Air Command) on alert and to evacuate our own cities—an action, incidentally, for which we have made almost no realistic preparations—in order to try to make them back down. The other possibility—to make the assumption that they don't mean what they seem to mean—may be too risky.

"Such maneuvers are risky for the Soviets because we may attack first. But the probability of such an attack is small and they might be willing to face this prospect. If we don't attack or back down, they may go to war. In particular, the Soviets could start such a war in any circumstances in which the risks of not going to war appear larger to Khrushchev than going to war.

"Consider a very plausible circumstance, the Hungarian revolution, which the Russians bloodily suppressed. Much pressure was applied to the United States to intervene. * * *

"Assume that we had acceded to that pressure and intervened. The Russians would then have been faced with three fairly serious choices:

"1. They could do nothing. This could almost automatically mean a Polish and East German revolt. Such a revolt would mean serious political repercussions within Russia, which we know worries them.

2. Secondly, they could fight a limited action. But that too, is risky. If we fight a limited action with conventional high-explosive weapons, we would lose, just by the sheer weight of numbers. If we go to atomic weapons, it is still doubtful that we would win and even more doubtful that the war would stay limited. In particular, the Soviets might easily believe that we were quite capable of suddenly expanding the scope of the war with a surprise attack at their strategic forces.

"3. The third possibility might appear safer. Rather than wait for the satellites to revolt or for the limited war to erupt into a general war at a time chosen by the Americans, they might decide to hit us right away. They could argue that this guaranteed them the all important first strike, at least if they hurried.

"It is clearly possible that such potentially dangerous situations could arise again, and in some of them we may be deeply, if involuntarily, involved. (Consider an East German revolt in which a rearmed West Germany felt obligated to intervene, or a United States-Chinese war which became all out.)

"Our retaliatory capability must always be good enough that, even if the Soviets evacuate their cities, they will still feel that it is more risky to strike than to accept whatever alternative seems in store. * * *

"Even, or especially, if the 'balance of terror' theory is correct and we don't have to worry about a deliberate Soviet attack on the United States, we are still faced with important strategic problems. In 1914 and 1939, it was the British who declared war, not the Germans. Such a circumstance might arise again, but, if the 'balance of terror' were correct, then we are as likely to be deterred as the Soviets; it is doubtful that the United States would resort to an all-out attack on the Soviets, even to correct or avenge major Soviet aggression in Europe.

"Consider a hypothetical situation in which American defenses were so weak and Soviet retaliatory forces so strong that, if the United States responded to a Soviet ground attack on Europe, the Soviet counter-retaliation would kill all 177 million Americans. Suppose, also, that the Russians have forced us to think for a day or so as to whether to start a thermonuclear war in cold blood in the full consciousness that the Russian retaliatory blow will mean the annihilation of every American.

"Who, if he were President of the United States, would initiate such a blow? Under such conditions it would not be surprising if neither the Europeans nor the Soviets found the U.S. promise to come to the aid of Europe credible.

"If the Soviets and the Europeans would not believe that we would honor our commitments to our allies if it means 177 million American deaths, what level of casualties do they believe we would accept? How many, indeed, if the decision were yours, would you accept? One hundred million? Fifty million? Ten million? One million? It's a hard question.

"I have discussed this question with some Europeans, asking them to guess how the American President would act. I have found no European who believed we would initiative a war if the casualties would be much over 20 million, and some believed we would be deterred at less than 2 million. One thoughtful critic thinks we would be deterred just at the prospect of the Russians destroying 5 or 10 empty cities.

"Published unclassified estimates of the amount of damage that the United States would suffer in a war generally run around 50 to 60 million. If these estimates are relevant—which is doubtful, since they generally assume a Soviet Union surprise attack on an unalert United States—then we are already deterred from living up to our alliance obligations. If they are not relevant, then we ought to make relevant estimates for both now and the future.

"The critical point is whether the Soviets believe we can keep our casualties to a level we would find acceptable, whatever that level may be.

"If so, they will be deterred from very provocative aggressions, such as a ground attack on Europe or evacuating their cities and presenting us with an ultimatum.

"But if they do not believe we can keep casualties to an acceptable level, the Soviets may feel safe in undertaking these extremely provocative military adventures. Or at least the Europeans may feel that the Soviets will feel safe, which creates an extremely dangerous pressure and blackmail situation.

"But what deters the Russians from a series of Koreas and Indochinas? It is probably less the fear of a direct U.S. attack with our current forces than the probability—in response to such crises—that the United States and its allies will greatly increase both their military strength and their resolve.

"The deterrent effect of this possibility can be increased by making explicit preparations for a capability for increasing our strength very rapidly whenever the other side provokes us. For example, in June 1950 the United States was engaged in a great debate whether our defense budget should be 14, 15, or 16 billion dollars. Along came Korea. Congress quickly authorized $60 billion, an increase by a factor of 4.

"No matter what successes the Russians had in Korea, that authorization represents an enormous military defeat for them. However, it was almost 3 years before that authorization was fully translated into increased budgets and increased military power. It is very valuable to have a capability to increase our defense expenditures, but this capability becomes many times more valuable if authorizations can be translated into military strength in a year or so.

"If the Russians know that, if they allow international relations to deteriorate, we will probably go into an effective crash program, then they may be much less willing to let international relations deteriorate.

"The problem, of course, is: 'Would we have the time to put in a useful program?' For example, the basic military posture—including installations—must be of the proper sort if it is to be possible to expand it, within a year or so, to the point where it is prepared to fight a war in addition to being able to deter one. Our current posture is probably far from optimum for doing this.

"Particularly if these preparations were at least moderately expensive and very explicit, the Russians might find it credible that we would initiate and carry through such a program if they were even provocative, say, on the scale of Korea or even less. The Russians would then be presented with three alternatives:

"1. They could strike the United States, before the buildup got very far. This might look very unattractive, especially since the buildup would almost certainly be accompanied by an increased alert and other measures to reduce the vulnerability of SAC.

"2. They could try to match the U.S. program. This would be very expensive.

"3. They could accept a position of inferiority. This would be serious, since we would now have a 'fight the war' capability as well as a 'deter the war' capability.

"In all cases the cost and risk of their provocation would have been increased, and it is not at all unlikely that the Soviets would take these extra costs and risks into account before they attempt provocation. If they were not deterred, then we could launch into the crash program so that we would be in a position to correct the results of their past provocation or at least so that they would be deterred, in the future, from exploiting these results.

"Need: 'Limited-war program'

"It might be particularly valuable to have credible and explicit plans to institute an adequate civil-defense program and a limited-war program. The institution of a crash program would make it very credible to the Russians, our allies, and neutrals that we would go to war at an appropriate level if we were provoked again.

"It is important to understand that we have this asset, the ability to spend large sums of money rather rapidly.

"Let us, for example, assume a new Berlin crisis * * * It would be most improbable that we would wage a war if the Russians gradually put the squeeze on Berlin. Nevertheless, in all likelihood State Department negotiators negotiating with the Russians will try to tell them that they couldn't afford to push us out of Berlin because in some vague way we will do something very violent; that we would use our military forces. But our negotiators would be afraid to spell our threat out, for nothing that they could spell out would be credible.

"Even today the Russians have told us that, if we send soldiers, they will kill them; that, if we send tanks, they will burn them, and that they can deter us from an all-out war, because they have rockets trained on our cities. The Soviets are saying that, at any level of violence that we care to use, they can either meet that level on the spot or promise such a severe punishment that we will be deterred. The Russians have also pointed out that Berlin is a chess game, not a poker game; that everybody can see what our position is.

"If the Soviets are right, that our only alternatives are violence or defeat—where defeat would be an acceptance of some new and unsatisfactory status of Berlin—then the Soviets could probably be successful in talking us into adopting a face-saving method of losing Berlin, rather than one which made it clear to all that we have suffered a serious defeat.

"In actual fact, we have some very strong cards to play, but if we do not know what these cards are we may be tricked out of playing them.

"If we refuse to accept a face-saving defeat and, in fact, force the Russians to rub our noses in the dirt, then it would be clear to all in NATO [North Atlantic Treaty Organization] and the United States that, unless we do something spectacular to recover the situation, the NATO nations can no longer rely on us for any kind of protection.

"Under these circumstances the U.S. Government would have to go into enormous defense budgets, probably close to at least $100 billion a year level. These defense budgets would be designed not only to implement our current forces but also to buy large limited-war forces, and to buy things like civil defense and the corresponding military forces that would give us a credible capability for initiating a war if a humiliating crisis should be repeated.

"There will also, under these circumstances, be enormous pressure on the NATO nations to combine into an even tighter alliance and to mobilize their resources for their defense also. This would mean that, as in Korea, even if we lost Berlin in the military sense, the Russians would have lost this particular campaign. While Berlin is important both ethically, politically and even resourcewise, its loss would not compare to the greatly increased power on the side of the West.

"This is the threat we have against the Russians. If we don't know that we have this threat, if we believe that increasing the budget by a factor or two really would mean some sort of immediate bankruptcy or other financial catastrophe, then the Russians can present us with alternatives which may in the end result in their getting the diplomatic, political, and foreign-policy victory. It is important that we understand our own strength.

"Conclusions

"Even if we have acquired the highest quality deterrence capability, we must still have a capability for fighting and surviving wars as long as it is possible to have such a capability. This is true not only because it is prudent to take out insurance against a war occurring unintentionally, but also because we must be able to stand up to the threat of fighting a war or even be able to credibly threaten to wage war ourself. We must have an "alternative to peace," as long as we don't have a world government and as long as it is technologically and economically possible to have one.

"Under current programs the United States may not be willing in a few years to accept a Soviet retaliatory blow, no matter what the provocation. The occurrence of such a situation is equivalent to breaking our alliance obligations and signing a nonaggression treaty with the Soviets—a nonaggression treaty with almost 200 million American hostages to guarantee performance.

"Since it now seems most unlikely that the Soviet menace will go away by itself and since we have eschewed preventive war as a possibility, we must seek the solution to our problems along the path of some degree of coexistence or collaboration.

"If we are to do this effectively, we must appear extremely competent to the Soviet leaders. They must feel that we are putting adequate attention and resources into meeting our military, political, and economic problems. This is not a question of attempting to bargain from strength, but one of looking so invulnerable to blackmail and aggressive tactics that Soviet leaders will feel it is worth while to make agreements and foolish not to.

"How Russians see U.S. leaders

"One gets the impression that up to about 1956 or 1957, the average senior Russian did have an enormous respect for U.S. planners and decision makers—a respect which they have now begun to lose. Many of the comments they make on remarks that some of our military and political leaders have made are contemptuous—and, a sober examination indicates, properly contemptuous. In the precarious present and the even more precarious future it would be well to go to some trouble not only to be competent as an antagonist to the Russians, but to look competent.

"Ideally, winning the cold war would mean the establishment of peaceful democratic and prosperous nations everywhere and the complete elimination of all international conflicts of greater significance than those that, for example, occasionally plague United States-British relations.

"No sober student of the international scene visualizes anything of this sort occurring. Even a more limited objective, the attainment of a physical security that is independent of Soviet good will, is probably unattainable. * * *

But the situation is worse than this. It is most unlikely that the world can live with an uncontrolled arms race lasting for several decades. It is not that we could not match Soviet expenditures; it is simply that, as technology advances, as weapons become more powerful and more diverse, it is most likely that there will have to be at least implicit agreements on their use, distribution and character if we are not to run unacceptably high risks of unauthorized or irresponsible behavior.

"No matter how inimical the Soviets feel toward us, they have common interests with us in this field. This does not mean that they will not try to use the common threat to obtain unilateral advantages: it just means that there is an important area for bargaining here and one which we must fully exploit.

"As a prerequisite to exploiting it we must do our homework. We must know what we are trying to achieve, the kind of concessions that we can afford to give, the kind of concessions that we insist on getting from the Soviets. All of this will require, among other things, much-higher-quality preparations for negotiations than have been common.

"Aside from the ideological differences and the problem of security itself, there does not seem to be any objective quarrel between the United States and Russia that justifies the risks and costs that we subject each other to. The big thing that the Soviet Union and the United States have to fear from each other is fear itself. * * *

"But, even if it were conceded that all we have to fear is fear itself, this would not imply that the problem is simple or easy, or even that it can be eliminated by any kind of arrangements that are practical for the next decade or so; it is only to say that there do not seem to be any fundamental blocks to making things more manageable and safer than is the current arrangement, namely, an almost uncontrolled arms race ameliorated by some vague implicit agreements and unilateral practices.

"Progress is so fast, the problems are so unprecedented and the lead times for cultural assimilation so long that it is difficult to believe that muddling through will work. We will need much better mechanisms for forward thinking, for imaginative research into problems of strategy and foreign policy, for anticipating future developments and for planning to meet them than we have had.

"These mechanisms can be made available. The tools actually or potentially available to the analyst, planner, and decision maker, both organizational and technical, are many orders of magnitude better than anything we have had before; it is just barely possible that, with a determined effort by large numbers of responsible people, we can achieve enough to make a significant difference. The survival of our civilization may depend on this effort being made. Let us hope that it can be done."

"UNITED STATES NOW FACING ITS GREAT DANGER—THIS WARNING IS CONTAINED IN A NEW OFFICIAL REPORT: THE UNITED STATES IS NOW OPEN TO A DEVASTATING NUCLEAR ATTACK—RUSSIA'S LEAD IN MISSILES IS SEEN AS CONFRONTING THE UNITED STATES WITH THE GREATEST DANGER IN ITS HISTORY

"(Here is an official report on the peril that menaces this Nation in this age of missiles and nuclear bombs. It was made for the Senate Foreign Relations Committee by the Washington Center of Foreign Policy Research of Johns Hopkins University. Researchers at Johns Hopkins have been making studies of military problems for the U.S. Government for many years. Following are excerpts from the report, released by the Senate committee on December 6, 1959:)

"The military position of the United States has declined in the short span of 15 years from one of unchallenged security to that of a nation both open and vulnerable to direct and devastating attack.

"This decline coincides with the rising military power of the Soviet Union, but the Soviet challenge could not have been made with such swiftness and success were it not for developments in military technology enabling that nation to threaten the security of the continental United States.

"The advent of the nuclear-missile weapons generation, heralded by the Soviet ICBM [intercontinental ballistic missile] test of August 1957 brought a drastic compression of the time required for the delivery of nuclear explosives at intercontinental ranges and a corresponding reduction in the attack warning time available to the victim of strategic aggression.

"These effects, added to the fact that there is as yet no active defense whatsoever against an intercontinental ballistic missile in flight, have gravely increased the temptations to strike first in a nuclear war.

"They have also made an opponent's manned-bomber force highly vulnerable to surprise attack by the side that first achieves a comprehensive strategic missile arm.

"Should the Soviets be the first to do so—and this now appears likely—the marked first-strike advantage now attributed to our Strategic Air Command would transfer to them.

"It is this possibility that disturbs those who see in the missile gap of the early 1960's the greatest danger to its security that the United States has ever faced.

"It is unlikely that the United States could close the anticipated missile gap, or appreciably shorten this dangerous transitional period, merely by accelerating the production of our present strategic weapons.

"Progress in military technology will continue at an accelerating rate during the next decade, increasing both the performance of individual weapons systems and the number of systems that it becomes feasible to develop.

"The arms race is likely to be of such scope and intensity as to provide each of the two great adversaries with repeated chances to seize an important lead in areas to which they assign priority.

"It does not now appear possible to develop active or passive defense systems capable of fully protecting large areas from nuclear attack, or even to provide those point targets whose locations are known to the enemy with invulnerability to multimegaton weapons.

"A high degree of national security is therefore likely to remain a goal unobtainable by military means alone during the next decade. The protection of retaliatory power will continue to depend heavily on the multiplication, dispersal and, later, the mobilizing of strategic-weapons systems.

"To assume that the level of mutual destruction now possible from a total nuclear war, or the magnitude and intensity of the accompanying radioactive fallout, is sufficiently high to make nuclear war suicidal—and therefore impossible—is but to evade the most serious military problem that this Nation has ever faced.

"The initiation of total war may be made increasingly hazardous for the potential aggressor, but it will remain a course open to him for at least the next decade.

"The United States, as the potential victim of such an attack, should have the ability to fight such a war in a rational manner and should give the most serious consideration to those civil-defense measures requisite to the protection and recovery of its population.

"Foreseeable progress in nuclear engineering will make possible a reduction in the costs, and consequent increase in the availability, of fissile materials.

"Such achievements can be expected to facilitate the nuclearizing of small wars, the nuclear arming of allies, and the spread of nuclear power to additional countries.

"It seems unlikely, however, that these effects will be significantly asymmetrical in their impact on the U.S.-U.S.S.R. power equation.

"Progress in chemical and biological weaponry is still far from the point where toxicological warfare could be considered of strategic decisiveness.

"These agents present ancillary civil and military defense problems, and may add to the difficulties of arms control, but their present military utility has been exaggerated.

"What United States can gain in space

"Operational satellite and satelloid space systems promise to become available in considerable numbers and sophistication during the next decade.

"Their military employment for reconnaissance missions, attack warning, and the facilitation of communications, navigation and weather prediction will be of relative advantage to the United States in view of its existing needs for intelligence of the Soviet Union and the management of globally deployed forces.

"Their use for these missions will, however, sharpen existing tensions between the United States and the Soviet Union and provide fruitful sources of new ones.

"It appears highly unlikely that these problems can be avoided, or solved, by a distinction between military and peaceful uses of space.

"The employment of manned orbiting vehicles, and of such maneuverable spacecraft as may be developed in this period, appears capable of radically altering the present strategic balance only under conditions which do not, as yet, appear probable.

"The unprecedented level of destruction that even the aggressor must expect to suffer in a thermonuclear exchange is the principal stabilizing factor in the strategic equation today, and is likely to remain so for the decade ahead. There may remain great military advantages in striking first, but, while the aggressor must accurately deliver a large number of weapons on military targets to triumph, a much smaller number of weapons landing on his industrial and civilian complexes may rob him of the fruits of victory.

"Opposing this stabilizing influence, however, are structural instabilities stemming from the characteristics and interaction of modern weapons systems, instabilities arising from differences of timing in the development or deployment of weapons, policy instabilities resulting from the use of war threats by powerful adversaries, and instabilities inherent in the spread of strategic nuclear weapons to a growing number of nation-states.

"Characteristics of today's strategic-weapons systems which tend toward instability include their vulnerability to surprise attack, the relatively low effectiveness of active defense systems, and the hair trigger characteristics of warning and reaction systems that make possible a war by accident or miscalculation.

"Differences between adversaries in the time-phasing of weapons systems may tempt an aggressive power to exploit a temporary but powerful military advantage before it evaporates or transfers to his enemy.

"The fact that modern strategic-weapons systems take many years to develop and deploy in adequate numbers makes it difficult to avoid such instabilities through prompt compensatory action.

"The United States could do much to achieve a substantial degree of nuclear stability in the decade ahead regardless of what the Soviet Union does, or does not, agree to do.

"Means appropriate to this objective would include the variegation, dispersal and protection of United States retaliatory weapons to reduce the Soviet temptations to strike first; mechanical safeguards to moderate the dangers of accidental war, and changes in our policies and military capabilities that lessen the free world's present dependence on nuclear threats for its security.

"Proposals for total disarmament, such as those recently made by the Soviet Union, should be approached in this regard with caution.

"Maximum disarmament, down to the level of national police forces, is not synonymous with maximum stability and may in fact be inconsistent with it.

"In a totally disarmed world, even a small number of secreted or clandestinely manufactured nuclear weapons could disrupt the international order and allow one power to dominate its more trusting adversaries.

"It is doubtful that any devisable, much less agreeable, inspection system could disclose such violations with a sufficient degree of certainty.

"International disputes over vital political and economic issues would, in any event, be likely to lead to the resumption of a hectic arms race and, in the final analysis, military power and technology would still decide the outcome.

"It is highly unlikely that any foolproof arms-control and inspection system can be devised or that absolute stability is attainable by the most strenuous of efforts in this direction. But there are sound reasons for believing that it is in the interest of the United States, the Soviet Union, and other members of the world community to achieve as high a degree of nuclear stability as possible in the next decade.

"As Russia's strength grows

"Increasing Soviet strategic capabilities are reducing the deterrent value of U.S. strategic nuclear power.

"The possibility of a Soviet surprise attack on the United States cannot be ruled out as long as the American retaliatory force, composed predominantly of manned bombers on unhardened, immobile, and unconcealed bases, remains extremely vulnerable to a missile attack.

"While the Soviets may never achieve an assured ability to knock out SAC [Strategic Air Command], conceivably they might prefer someday to risk the damage a crippled SAC could inflict on them rather than to risk the dangers of not striking first at the American strategic force.

"Even during the period of its great vulnerability, American retaliatory power retains considerable deterrent value because of the uncertainties discouraging a Soviet first strike.

"However, American security must remain precarious unless SAC's present vulnerability is remedied within a short period of time."

ROCKEFELLER STUDY—"POSSIBILITY OF WAR MUST BE FACED"

The danger of Soviet superiority in arms is discussed in a report on "The Mid-Century Challenge to U.S. Foreign Policy," published December 7 by the Rockefeller Brothers Fund, Inc. It is based on a study by a panel headed by Dean Rusk, former Assistant Secretary of State. Excerpts follow:

"A foreign policy which devoted itself exclusively to avoiding war would neglect the constructive aspects out of which a true peace must develop. A free nation which sought nothing but peace would gain peace only at the price of its freedom. * * *

"The possibility of war must be faced. * * * The nature of the present situation offers no escape.

"The possibility cannot be ruled out that the Soviet leadership, if it secures a clear superiority in the arms race, will use this advantage to blackmail or to attack its major opponent without warning. That possibility must at all costs be forestalled.

"Under present conditions, and for as long as necessary, the strength of the Western deterrent must be maintained, with clear realization that this cannot be done easily or once and for all.

"The abolition of arms has been once more proposed by the Soviet Government. Whether the proposal is serious is open to doubt. * * *

"Negotiations must test whether there are sufficiently significant changes in the Russian position to make it possible to move toward a mutually acceptable plan for disarmament. * * *

"Persistent and unremitting efforts to achieve step-by-step control and reduction of arms should not blind the United States to the really fundamental issues involved. If the control of arms becomes effective on a broad scale, it will almost certainly be because international institutions will have developed greatly in scope and authority over the coming years.

"This underlying, basic Soviet danger [of expanding Communist power and isolation of the United States] has not been as well understood in the United States as it should be. Certainly the situation will not be changed by a lull in the crises which have served to keep the United States awake. * * *

"In any case, the free world, as a basic tenet of policy, must not permit the Communist states to extend their rule.

"The United States cannot accept, under the guise of compromise or the easing of tensions, measures which would abandon West Berlin to Communist rule, dissolve NATO [North Atlantic Treaty Organization], allow West Germany to fall within the Soviet orbit, or otherwise undermine the free states of Europe. * * *

"Possibilities must be kept open, but the West cannot afford to accept illusory agreements."

CIVIL RIGHTS

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BENTLEY] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and include an address.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. BENTLEY. Mr. Speaker, I am including in my remarks an address given on December 6, 1959, in New York City by Dr. John A. Hannah, president of Michigan State University and Chairman of the Commission on Civil Rights. Dr. Hannah's address was the first in the series of Jacob M. Alson Lectures sponsored by the Anti-Defamation League and is indeed an excellent and comprehensive speech on the problem of civil rights.

The address follows:

ADDRESS BY JOHN A. HANNAH, PRESIDENT, MICHIGAN STATE UNIVERSITY, AND CHAIRMAN, COMMISSION ON CIVIL RIGHTS, ALSON LECTURESHIP, ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE, NEW YORK CITY, DECEMBER 6, 1959

It is a great honor to be permitted to inaugurate the Jacob M. Alson Lectures, and this, the first in the series, is presented in the hope that it will contribute to a better understanding of the whole complex problem of civil rights, and help to justify the founder's belief that wisdom will grow out of understanding.

Your officers were generous in their demarcation of the area for discussion. They reflected the broad interests of this organization, which has stood for so long in the forefront of the struggle to free men's minds of the intolerance and prejudice which are at the root of our civil rights problems.

This lecture will be in two parts. The first will deal briefly with the Commission on Civil Rights. The second will be an attempt to give historical perspective to today's situation. Some knowledge of history makes it easier to account for some of the attitudes taken, the opinions held, the courses of action proposed in 1959.

There is risk in this approach for we find ourselves balancing precariously on the narrow line between a maze of legal technicalities on the one hand, and a mass of generalities on the other.

I. THE COMMISSION ON CIVIL RIGHTS

The establishment of the Commission on Civil Rights is of itself of real significance in history inasmuch as the act creating it approved by the Congress in 1957 was the first national civil rights bill passed since 1875. The act, while much compromised during the enactment process, does represent a determination to come to grips with a thorny problem that has been with us for more than 300 years.

There is cause to wonder why 82 years should pass after 1875 before we again turned our attention as a nation to this vexsome issue, for the matter of civil rights concerns the fundamental precepts and principles upon which our democratic system is being painfully built, day after day and year after year. Until these issues are finally resolved, we cannot truthfully claim that our idealistic, courageous experiment in self-government has been wholly successful, nor predict that the American dream will ever be fully realized. Perhaps the very complexity of the issues, or their emotional overtones, have made us reluctant to face up to the fact that there has indeed been a serious hiatus between promise and performance in our democracy.

However that may be, the Congress did take a meaningful if tentative step forward in passing the Civil Rights Act of 1957. And, as if anticipating that subsequent debate might grow too violent without the restraining force of fact, it created the Commission on Civil Rights as a fact-finding body with authority and responsibility to inquire and to report, but without authority to take corrective or enforcement action. Realization that the Commission is thus restricted in its activities is essential to any fair appraisal of its work to date. It has no other answer to those who are critical because it has not done something to ameliorate the situation.

The Congress specifically directed the Commission to make inquiry into repeated allegations that some citizens were being deprived of their right to register, vote, and have their votes counted by reason of their color, race, religion, or national origin, and to make appropriate recommendations for action if these allegations were found to be justified by fact.

By this directive, the Congress indicated that voting is a key issue. If government derives its just powers from the consent of the governed, and votes are the accepted expressions of the people's will, then denial of the right to vote constitutes an intolerable subversion of national self-interest.

There is no need to labor this point. All intelligent, objective Americans will subscribe to this philosophy, for they appreciate how precious the right to vote is to them. I believe that most of us understand, even though dimly at times, that when one man's right to vote is denied, every man's right to vote is thereby jeopardized.

Suffice it for our purposes today to say that on the basis of affidavits, investigation, and hearings, the Commission found and reported to the President and the Congress that qualified Americans—and many, many thousands of them—are in fact being denied the right to vote because they are members of the Negro race, and for no other reason. This deprivation is being accomplished through the creation of legal impediments, administrative obstacles, and sometimes through positive discouragement engendered by fears of economic reprisal and physical harm.

Were there time I could cite a great many instances in which distinguished citizens with doctor of philosophy degrees earned in some of America's foremost universities have been denied the right to register and to vote on the flimsiest of excuses, the actual reason being that they are Negroes.

We learned of doctors, lawyers, schoolteachers, registered nurses, and successful businessmen being denied the right to register and to vote, simply because they are Negroes.

We learned of courageous young men who have fought in our country's defense, and who will carry crippling battle scars all of their lives, who are being denied the right to vote, just because their skins are black.

It should shock you to learn that today, in December 1959, there are at least 16 counties in the United States in which one-third or more of the population is nonwhite in which not a single nonwhite is permitted to register to vote. In a far larger number of counties with very substantial numbers of Negro citizens, only a token—and a very small token—number are permitted to vote.

These nonwhite citizens live useful lives, pay taxes, serve in our military forces, and yet they are denied the right to any voice in the conduct of a Government they support with their taxes and are willing to defend with their lives if need be.

This is indefensible. The record is clear. The facts are undisputed. The case has been made. It remains to be seen whether we will have the courage and good sense to do something about it.

Early in its work, the Commission decided to concentrate upon two other areas in which there was substantial reason to believe that equal protection of the law was not being extended to all citizens equally. These were education and housing.

This decision was taken deliberately in full realization that there were many other areas worthy of attention, including the use of public accommodations, the administration of justice, the content of school curriculums in which civil rights are studied, employment practices, discrimination in transportation and in labor union membership, to name a few.

But the lifetime of the Commission then being limited to some 16 months, it was decided to undertake extensive investigation into voting as spelled out by the congressional edict and two other areas of education and housing only. The Commission felt that these were key areas.

Now that the life of the Commission has been extended for another 2 years, it proposes to venture into some other areas but will continue to place its first emphasis on voting, education, and housing.

How shocking the situation is in one of the areas to which the Commission proposes to address its attention—the administration of justice—was vividly portrayed recently when the Attorney General of the United States reported an exhaustive investigation into a murder of a Negro in a State in which the grand jury failed to take any action despite the fact that all the evidence necessary to indict the participants in this revolting crime had been submitted to local authorities.

The Commission turned its attention to education for a number of pressing reasons. The first was that great public interest had been aroused by the Supreme Court's decision against school segregation; and in matters of public policy, public interest is an essential to informed public action. The second was because, in the words of the report, "The American system of public education must be preserved without impairment because an educated citizenry is the mainstay of the Republic and full educational opportunity for each and every citizen is America's major defense against the world threat to freedom." The third, unexpressed but none the less compelling, was that traditionally we have looked to education to free men's minds of intolerance and prejudice, and we must look to education to work its slow but certain miracles in the whole broad area of civil rights if we are to make substantial progress toward achievement of our national ideals. The fourth was because the Commission felt that it could make a valuable contribution by identifying the factors and influences that resulted in public acceptance of school desegregation in some communities and commotion and chaos in others.

Here, too, the Commission made findings of the fact and submitted recommendations to the President and the Congress.

The report states that "the problem is how to comply with the Supreme Court decision while preserving and even improving public education. The ultimate choice of each State (and community) is between finding reasonable ways of ending compulsory segregation in its schools or abandoning its system of free public education."

Events and developments of recent months have verified the validity of that analysis.

Let us turn quickly now to a brief comment on the housing problem, the third area of major concern to the Commission in the early months of its operations. Voting rights and school segregation have long been recognized as issues of paramount importance, but it was not until comparatively recently that we recognized that how men live is affected to a great degree by the extent to which equal protection of the law is extended to them. Our concern is heightened by the evidence coming in day after day as to the effect of poor housing on juvenile delinquency, crime rates, and other social ills.

Housing conditions and practices are of particular importance because abuses here do not tend to be concentrated in one section of the country, but are plainly evident in most of our large cities everywhere. Housing is no sectional problem; it is one with which all of us are immediately and uncomfortably concerned. I say "uncomfortably" because as Julius Pringle of South Carolina said to his northern countrymen in the days just before the Civil War:

"To preach distant reform is very cheap philanthropy—the cheaper in proportion to the distance. The feeling of self-satisfaction exists without the necessity of personal sacrifice."

All of us know how much easier it is to say "they should do something about it" than to admit "we should do something about it." In housing, all Americans have the problem on their doorsteps or in their front yards, and here more than Negroes are involved. Here in New York, for example, you have the matter of the Puerto Ricans as well as of the Negroes in your midst, and members of this organization certainly know well that religious as well as racial discrimination may play a forceful role in deciding who shall live where. Chicago, as an example, has its problems with more than 1 million Negroes living within its city limits, including a very large number who have fled the discrimination of the South to find little improvement in the North. The west coast, where our Commission will hold hearings late next month, wrestles with the additional troublesome task of dealing equitably with large numbers of Mexican-Americans and Americans of oriental descent. Some communities find themselves troubled by the records of their treatment of American Indians. Housing is a problem of greater diversity and range than perhaps any other in this whole civil rights area.

The problem is epitomized in one passage from the Commission's report that I would like to call to your attention.

Housing, it is pointed out, seems to be the one commodity in the American market that is not freely available on equal terms to everyone who can afford to pay. It would be an effront to human dignity for any one group of Americans to be restricted to wearing only hand-me-down clothing, or to eating the leftovers of other's food. Like food and clothing, housing is an essential of life, yet most nonwhite American families have no choice but secondhand homes in the most congested and least desirable sections of our cities. The results can be seen in high rates of disease, fire, juvenile delinquency, crime, and social demoralization among those forced to live in such conditions. A nation dedicated to respect for the human dignity of every individual should not permit such conditions to continue.

In making its preliminary recommendations for correction of abuses in the field of housing, the Commission was encouraged by its observations of what has been accomplished in some places, including here in New York and in Atlanta. There are high walls of racial and religious bigotry still to be torn down, but this is one area in which we can justifiably hope for substantial improvement in the years immediately ahead.

One basis for this justification is that the Federal, State, and municipal governments are so intimately and actively concerned through slum-clearance and rehabilitation programs of such size as to be heavily influential. We have recognized slums as an intolerable social disgrace, and we are setting about eliminating them. Machinery already in motion and likely to be put in motion bid fair to bring about a great improvement in the housing situation in the foreseeable future. Another reason for optimism results from the fact that the Federal Government is so heavily committed in the financing and mortgage guaranteeing of such a substantial proportion of all new housing—and certainly there is no justification for our Government itself practicing or encouraging housing discrimination.

In the few busy months of its existence, the Civil Rights Commission has learned that the basic problem is one of securing the full rights of American citizenship to those being denied in any degree "that vital recognition of human dignity, the equal protection of the laws." It has learned that, by and large, the problem is a racial problem. The children and grandchildren of the waves of immigrants from the nations of Europe, reared and educated as Americans, have dispersed and strengthened our communities everywhere. Discrimination, once widespread and victimizing Americans for reasons of race, religion, national origin, and economics, is now largely concentrated upon our 18 million Negro citizens.

It is not surprising that this is so, for many social philosophers have pointed out over the years that the existence of a sizable Negro minority has been "the acid test of American democracy."

In part this is the old problem of the vicious circle. Slavery, economic discrimination, and second-class citizenship have demoralized a considerable portion of those suffering these injustices, and the consequent demoralization has then been seen by others as an excuse for continuing some of the very conditions that cause the demoralization.

The fundamental interrelationships among the subjects of voting, education, and housing make it impossible for the problem to be solved by the improvement of any one factor alone. If the right to vote is secured but there is not equal opportunity in education and housing, the value of that right will be discounted by apathy and ignorance. If compulsory discrimination is ended in public education, but children continue to be brought up in slums and restricted areas of racial concentration, the conditions for good education and good citizenship will still not obtain. If decent housing is made available to nonwhites on equal terms but their education and habits of citizenship are not raised, new neighborhoods will degenerate into slums.

Let us turn now to a consideration of a few of the historical facts without which we cannot hope to understand the true nature of the situation in which we find ourselves as we approach the close of our second century of existence as a Nation, born in revolution and dedicated to the evolutionary process as a political philosophy.

II. CIVIL RIGHTS IN HISTORICAL PERSPECTIVE

An enlightened audience such as this must be presumed to have familiarity with the great basic documents of American history, but at times great public debates over issues of general concern drive us back to our books to refresh our memories and to adjust our perspectives. Such is the case today when the American people are coming to grips again with the matter of how to make practice fit theory in the field of civil rights.

What, they properly ask, is our fundamental philosophy in this matter? What do the documents say? What does the record show?

Basic to all our political thinking is the Declaration of Independence, the revolutionary manifesto that still amazes us by its daring, its eloquence, its timelessness.

You will recall that the Declaration opens with what the leaders of the revolution against kingly tyranny considered to be a catalog of fundamental human liberties as they understood them to be after years of studying the writings of the social philosophers who gave to those times the name of the Age of Enlightenment. They asserted flatly and unequivocably their fundamental belief in one Creator who had endowed His human creatures equally. They declared that from this endowed equality there flowed political rights to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. They espoused the theory that governments have no inherent powers, but derive them from the consent of the governed.

The second great controlling document is, of course, our Constitution. Its preamble dedicates the Constitution to the establishment of justice in the new nation, and to securing the blessings of hard-won political liberty to the people of the new country. These had been cataloged in general terms in the Declaration of Independence.

The great American experiment in democratic self-government has always had a fascinating attraction for political scientists and social philosophers in other lands. We have attracted many foreign observers to our shores, and we have found our full share of critics among them. Some of the observers—notably the Frenchman de Tocqueville and the Englishman Lord Bryce—have themselves contributed to our store of knowledge about ourselves, and their works have in time become listed among our basic American documents.

More recently, a renowned Swedish social scientist, Gunnar Myrdal, has contributed to foreign observation of the American scene. His study of the Negro in American society, sponsored by the Carnegie Corporation and published in 1944 under the title of "An American Dilemma," bears the significant subtitle, "The Negro Problem and Modern Democracy." This is a monumental work well worth reading. Its opening chapters bear especially on the matter of historical backgrounds of social conditions as he found them to be in the course of his scholarly study. Myrdal is important to us because his is the most recent comprehensive study by a competent foreign observer of one facet of the question with which we are dealing today.

He is another of those who sees the Negro problem as central to the whole issue of the eventual success of our democratic experiment. In his words "the Negro problem in America represents a moral lag in the development of the Nation, and a study of it must record nearly everything which is bad and wrong in America." Because of the recency of his study, and because the disinterested though friendly analysis he makes is so appropriate, I will draw heavily upon his report.

Myrdal pays his sincere tribute to what he terms the American Creed which, he says, is so generally approved and applauded by all citizens that it explains the periods of torment through which we pass periodically as we try our honest best to make reality out of idealistic theory. "America," he writes, "is continuously struggling for its soul."

He says later that "for practical purposes the main norms of the American Creed as usually pronounced are centered in the belief in equality and in the rights to liberty" as expounded in the Declaration, in the Constitution, and in the Bill of Rights. Our blueprint for national existence was, he declares, the most liberal and enlightened charter yet devised.

Lawyers often appeal to the Constitution in their contests in the modern day, but in the courts of public opinion the appeal is more often to the principles of the Declaration and even beyond to what for want of a better term has often been cited as "the higher law." The Declaration itself appealed to "the laws of Nature and of Nature's God" and "to the Supreme God of the World for the rectitude of our intentions."

Looking at these living documents in retrospect, we of this day can clearly see that what the founders of our Nation did was to set up for their new country a set of standards—of ideals—so lofty as to be almost beyond attainment but so attractive that they would serve as a constant challenge to men of good will, so promising that they would inspire heroic efforts to achieve them, so closely in harmony with that which is divine in thinking man that any discordant notes would leave him unhappily dissatisfied and discontented until he had found a way to silence them forever.

The Founding Fathers were not content with voicing lofty idealism. Being eminently practical men who had risked their lives in revolution against a powerful king and growing empire, they installed the basic elements of a political system by which these ideals might be achieved in time. They believed in the perfectability of man, and so believing, they trusted those who would come after them to work out the differences, resolve the conflicts, settle the issues that were bound to arise in a new and expanding country.

Both their idealism and the practicality were put to the test at the outset. Slavery was an established institution, and slavery was inconsistent with their ideals of human freedom and dignity. Being practical men, they arrived at a compromise, which was to forbid importation of slaves after a specific future date in the hope and belief that with the supply of human chattels cut off, the institution itself would eventually wither away in the heat and light of public discussion.

That they were wrong we know now; the political machine broke down when it was called upon to deal with this issue, and our country resorted to war to settle it, perhaps needlessly.

All this serves to emphasize the fact that the Negro problem has been with us from the beginning of our country, and that our success or failure in dealing with it has always been and continues to be the measure of our success or failure in making practical reality fit our theoretical idealism.

All of our history, speaking generally, is a reflection of our constant concern that we have not as yet achieved the ideals to which we officially and traditionally aspire. This accounts, as Myrdal points out, for our propensity to self-criticism, which sometimes amazes and pains our friends and gives aid and comfort to our enemies, as today when world communism capitalizes upon our struggles with our own racial problems.

But viewed in retrospect, our history is one of great overall progress toward the idealistic goals which we hold constantly before our eyes.

Take as one example the extension of the voting franchise. At the end of the Revolution we were a nation of approximately 3,250,000. More than 1 million were not free—they were slaves or bondsmen. Of the 2 million free citizens, not more than 120,000 were allowed to vote. The others were disenfranchised becaues they were women, or did not own property of sufficient value, or for other reasons.

Today, the right to vote in most of America is almost universal. Property qualifications have been eliminated save for token poll taxes, and women have won the right to the ballot. Indeed, the lag in Negro voting in some sections of the South is almost the sole remaining disfiguring blot on a record of which to be proud. By this margin do we still fall short of our goal.

We could cite many other significant advances in social reforms: child labor laws, the abolition of flogging in the military services, our changed penological practices, our more humane treatment of the insane, provisions for care of the indigent at public cost, social security laws, labor legislation, public support of education and scholarly research, and many others. It is a record justifying both pride in what we have done as a people, and hope that we will continue to make steady progress toward our lofty goals.

One of Professor Myrdal's most penetrating observations is that as a people, we are marked by a high degree of disrespect for the law. He points out that when we as individuals think a law is wrong, oppressive or unjust, we tend to disobey it, and feel no particular twinges of conscience, justifying our behavior on a sort of built-in system of appeals to a higher unwritten law.

We need look no farther back in our history than to the 18th amendment for the classic illustration. That was added to our Constitution in perfectly proper legal form, and prohibition became the law of the land. But many people thought the law was wrong and proceeded to disobey it willfully. Such corruption of society developed that in time it was repealed. In this instance, we proved that our political machinery for social reform could work in either direction.

But it is of more significance to look to the record of the North's reaction in the days before the Civil War to the Fugitive Slave Laws and the Dred Scott decision of the Supreme Court.

The abolitionists were outraged, and those who did not then share their violent sentiments were aroused by appeals beyond the courts and the Constitution to "the higher law."

Dwight Lowell Dumond, in his "Antislavery Origins of the Civil War," gives us a succinct account of the reaction of the Northern States. Some of the actions and language seem strangely familiar today. For example, laws were passed by many Northern States clearly intended to nullify Federal law; "interposition" was proposed and advocated widely; the use of State and county jails for the detention of fugitive slaves was prohibited.

One provision of the Fugitive Slave Laws is conceded to have stirred much of the opposition in the North. It specifically forbade testimony by those alleged to be fugitive slaves, and hence the free Negro was practically defenseless against plain kidnaping, even in Northern States. The North was beginning to learn the lesson of the indivisibility of freedom. As Dumond remarks, "so long as these acts remained on the statute books, the rights of free men were in jeopardy." Zealousness to protect those rights earned converts to the antislavery cause, and events rushed on to the ultimate disaster of war.

One might apologize for injecting so much history into this discussion were it not that the problems of today are inextricably tied into events and developments of the past. Indeed, we need look back to ancient Greece for some of our references, for it was Aristotle who proclaimed that some men were natural slaves, fit for no other role in life. His ideal State was ruled by an elite leisure class of small size, its wants and necessities supplied by slaves and a middle class of artisans skilled in their crafts but not in politics.

The influence of Aristotle's thinking was enormous. This philosophy was such convenient comfort to those who wanted to rationalize conquest, plunder, and empire-building.

We are told by Lewis Hanke in his new book, "Aristotle and the American Indians," how a great debate was staged in Spain in the middle of the 16th century in an attempt to reconcile divergent views towards treatment of the Indians being encountered by soldiers of the Spanish King in their conquests in the New World. Was it right to make war upon and enslave the heathen Indians? Some said it was, and cited Aristotle as the great authority. Others disputed this view on grounds of humanitarianism, some even daring to claim that the Indians had a respectable culture and religion of their own, and were responsible human beings deserving to be treated as such.

Quite incidentally, we find something of Aristotle's view coloring today the arguments of those who seem to be otherwise intelligent Americans who would have us educate only an intellectual elite and who would have us set up an intellectual aristocracy on the questionable theory that only the brilliant should inherit the earth.

But enough of history. It is hoped that these sketchy references will suffice to prove that we are not dealing with new problems and hence are not cursed by fate beyond all previous generations. We are instead in the stream of history in this as in all other human affairs, and shall have to make our way as best we can, given the benefit of the experience of those who have gone before us and who have contributed their full share to the solution of mankind's besetting problems.

Your officers have been so kind as to suggest that an attempt to look to the future would be in order. This is risky business at best when we are dealing with what are essentially human relations, which are governed by so many emotional and cultural influences which laws cannot easily control.

But reading of history, and observation of the current scene, lead to the inescapable conclusion that our great ideals still stand before us as bright and shining as ever, and that they may be seen even more clearly today because as a people we have moved much closer to them than our fathers were. Moreover, the machinery of free public discussion and decision, on which the founders placed their hopes, is not only unimpaired, it is much improved over the first machinery they first designed.

In the current controversy and debate, we have the advantage of more widespread education and better media for the transmittal of information than ever before. For this we may well be thankful.

Dumond is of the opinion that the fact that the Deep South of prior to the Civil War was sealed almost hermetically against the intrusion of Northern thought and opinion led almost inescapably to the test of arms. He contends that had ideas been left free to compete, the decision might have evolved less painfully.

To those who are impatient with the slowness of progress, we can point to the lesson of history that great social changes do not come overnight or totally; they come as the result of the interworking of many forces, among which one of the most powerful is the inherent desire of most people to be decent.

Dumond, in an enlightening paragraph on this general topic, says: "We are accustomed to speak of public opinion as influencing our legislative bodies, our executive officers, and even our judiciary. It is only a partially correct observation. Changes in the basic philosophy of a people are as imperceptible but fully as irresistible as the ebb and flow of the tides. Institutional changes—constitutions and constitutional interpretations, religious doctrines, political alinements, and governmental policies—follow with equal certainty and precision. Public opinion rises, falls, and changes in course with the fitfulness of the winds, ever sensitive to fortuitous circumstances and the vagaries of the hour. It is indicative of the direction, though not of the degree, of a changing philosophy, and the intellectual ferment produced by its tornadic disturbances leaves an indelible impression upon that philosophy. The lag gives stability to our institutions, and pain to our reformers."

Most of all, I find comfort and hope in our lively national conscience, which leads us to engage in wars for the freedom of mankind, give and lend billions to nations less well endowed or more unfortunate than our own, contribute hundreds of millions to private charity, and in the face of the free world's applause for the humanitarianism of our actions, still leads us to undertake another searching inquiry into why we have not done better by some of our people here at home. If the Commission on Civil Rights does nothing more than to prick that national conscience until it will give us no rest as a people so long as some human wrongs go unrighted, then it will have justified its existence.

We see many signs of this stirring of conscience. We find great newspapers and national leaders preaching the inescapable truth that when the rights of one are threatened, the rights of none are safe. In time, our people will come to believe as one that when a synagogue is bombed, no Christian church is safe; that when one public school is bombed, no school is steady on its foundations; that when one man is lynched, the security of each of us is diminished by so much; that when one man is denied the right to vote, our own freedom of decision is compromised.

The indivisibility of freedom is the shield of all other liberties. Our political system is still capable of repairing the errors in the social order that deny us that indivisibility. In that knowledge lies our principal hope.

Judge Harold R. Medina, himself the victim of cruel persecution, had this to say recently:

"Freedom is the study of a lifetime. Our Bill of Rights, which looks so simple when we first read it in school, is a dynamic, flexible, ever-expanding and growing definition of our fundamental rights. Like the search for truth, the ultimate in freedom is always just over the horizon or just beyond our grasp. The trick is not to lose it, or any part of it, but rather to get as much more of it as we can properly assimilate."

Finally, we must remember that we are dealing with human beings and their emotions, and we must be patient in that knowledge, for man is fearfully and wonderfully made. Swinburne suggested something of the complexity of man when he wrote:

"Before the beginning of years
There came to the making of man
Time, with the gift of tears;
Grief, with a glass than ran;
Pleasure, with pain for leaven;
Summer, with flowers that fell;
Remembrance fallen from heaven,
And madness risen from hell;
Strength without hands to smite;
Love that endures for a breath;
Night, the shadow of light,
And life, the shadow of death."

Nothing gives me greater hope than the very experience of being here today and the freedom I, as a Protestant Christian, have to bring to you who are of the Jewish faith, the message of a great American Catholic as a fitting conclusion.

Father Theodore Hesburgh, the president of the University of Notre Dame, appended these eloquent words to the report of the Commission on Civil Rights, of which he is a member who has served superbly well. Let them serve as a summing up and, if you will, a clarion call to duty for those who truly believe in the essential dignity of all individuals.

"No one who really believes in full-fledged citizenship for all Americans should delude himself today regarding the true personal price involved in achieving it. The price will be nothing short of heroism in certain areas. Because of the deep emotional overtones of the problem, and its existence in every phase of American life, no American can escape taking a stand on civil rights. * * * Each of us must choose to deepen the anguish of the problem, by silence and passivity, if nothing more, or must take a forthright stand on principles that give some hope of eventual solution."

The lines are forming all over America; on which side shall we stand?

HIGH INTEREST NOW THE ADMINISTRATION'S TOP PRIORITY PROGRAM—BIG BANKERS HELP TO PLAN NATIONAL HOUSE-TO-HOUSE DRIVE TO LAUNCH "CITIZENS' CAMPAIGN AGAINST INFLATION"—PRESIDENT EISENHOWER SUGGESTS MILLIONS OF LETTERS, TELEGRAMS, AND PHONE CALLS TO MEMBERS OF CONGRESS

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, President Eisenhower's first special message to this session of Congress, which we received yesterday, renews the administration's plea for removing the 42-year-old ceiling on interest rates which the Treasury can pay to issue bonds. Of all the vital issues facing this Nation, including those on which our national survival may hinge, the administration has given top priority to its ambitions to achieve further increases in interest rates. The Wall Street Journal this morning put it this way:

Eisenhower puts priority on end of bond rate limit.

Yesterday I discussed some aspects of the organized squeeze play which is being put on Congress in an effort to obtain a further boost in interest rates. The most obvious part of the squeeze play has been the part played by the Federal Reserve. There is a loophole in the interest-rate law. The law mentions only marketable bonds and says nothing about a ceiling for Treasury bills, certificates, and other forms of short-term borrowing. This has provided the Federal Reserve a means of bringing about a most unusual phenomenon—it has driven short-term interest rates up above long-term interest rates.

The topic of immediate interest yesterday involved a question of what the interest rate would be on a new issue of 1-year bills on which the Treasury was taking bids yesterday. The financial press was stating in authoritative tones that the rate would top 5 percent, and might possibly go as high as 5¼ percent. The financial press was calling the new predicted rate on these bills the "biggest bargain in history." As I pointed out, the financial community was advertising the bargain in advance. Congress was being blamed for the giveaway of the taxpayers' money, and apparently all concerned wanted the public to know this.

Furthermore, the predictions of yesterday turned out to be highly accurate, the price at which the Treasury sold these bills gives a yield of 5.05 percent, on the basis of the way the Treasury computes the yield on bills. Actually the interest yield is much higher for two reasons: First, the bills are discounted in advance; and, second, the yield is computed on the basis of a year of 360 days. The real interest yield on the bills sold yesterday is equivalent to an interest yield of 5.36 percent on a Treasury bond.

It should not be necessary to elaborate on my remarks of yesterday concerning the phony arguments which are being used to try to justify removing the 4¼ percent ceiling. Certainly two things are clear: First, if the ceiling is removed, all interest rates will be boosted, and the average interest rate which the Government will have to pay will be boosted; second, the propaganda slogans which are to the effect that issuing short-term debt is "more inflationary" than issuing long-term debt do not have a factual leg to stand on.

Today I should like to call attention to some of the other aspects of the organized squeeze play which has been planned for this session of Congress.

SMALL CONTRIBUTORS ASKED TO HELP PAY ADVERTISING COSTS

Last November the heads of many big financial, banking, and insurance organizations met with the President and Vice President here in Washington and laid plans for a renewed drive in support of what is called the President's "campaign against inflation." The renewed crusade planned at that time, according to news reports, was to include a national house-to-house drive and a solicitation of funds in small amounts of $1 to $10 from millions of American families, to help pay for leaflets, billboard advertising, and so forth, calling for support of the administration's "fight against inflation." This national house-to-house drive was to begin shortly after the first of this year.

The dignitaries who helped launch the new crusade include the heads of such organizations as the New York Stock Exchange, the Investment Bankers Association, the American Bankers Association, the National Association of Manufacturers, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, and others.

In his address to this assemblage, President Eisenhower suggested that:

"I for one hope that you will not forget what telegrams, letters and phone calls coming in by the millions can do to help the Congress, and the President and the entire organization he heads, in doing the right thing. This, I would feel, would be one of the great services you can now accomplish for the United States."

We all know of course that the great crusade against inflation is not confined to efforts to boost interest rates. The crusade is directed at other things such as appropriation measures which the administration does not like. But high interest has been an intimate part of the crusade at all times, and recently it has become the first and foremost objective of the crusade.

It occurred to me that it might be of interest to Members, and perhaps even helpful in analyzing some of their mail problems, if they had a fresh review of some of the newspaper reports written at the time the renewed and more invigorated crusade was launched last November. I invite the Members' attention to two such reports; one from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, written by Richard Dudman, and the other from the Washington Post and Times Herald, written by S. Oliver Goodman. These are in part as follows:

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, Nov. 3, 1957]

NATIONAL HOUSE-TO-HOUSE DRIVE AGAINST INFLATION AND SPENDING BACKED BY EISENHOWER, NIXON—GROUP ORGANIZED BY SOME OF COUNTRY'S TOP BANKERS AND INSURANCE MEN WHO WILL SEEK CONTRIBUTIONS FOR ADVERTISING AND PLEDGES TO SAVE MONEY

(By Richard Dudman)

A house-to-house crusade against inflation was organized yesterday with the backing of President Eisenhower and Vice President NIXON.

The organizers, a non-Government group including some of the Nation's top bankers and insurance men, plan to open the campaign shortly after the first of the year.

They plan to seek contributions of $1, $5 or $10 from millions of Americans to finance leaflets and billboard advertisements attacking inflation, supporting a sound dollar and advocating less private and public spending.

They also hope to persuade 10 million to 15 million Americans to sign pledge cards promising to work for sound Government fiscal policies, to save more money and spend more wisely, and to increase their individual productivity.

H. Bruce Palmer, president of the Mutual Benefit Life Insurance Co. of Newark, N.J., explained the program to reporters after speeches by the President and Vice President and a day of planning and discussion.

He said the idea was his own. After sounding out several national organizations, he asked and obtained the cooperation of W. Allen Wallis, executive vice chairman of the Cabinet Committee of Price Stability for Economic Growth, headed by NIXON.

Attending the meeting were 85 persons representing 48 national organizations in fields including banking, insurance, advertising, farming, private power, investment, real estate, veterans' affairs, and home building.

Those present included G. Keith Funston, president of the New York Stock Exchange; Harschel D. Newsom, master of the National Grange; John D. Randall, president of the American Bar Association; Martin B. McKenally, national commander of the American Legion; Dr. Louis M. Orr, president of the American Medical Association; Erwin D. Canham, president of the United States Chamber of Commerce; John C. Hagan Jr., president of the Investment Bankers Association of America, and Kenneth R. Miller, general manager of the National Association of Manufacturers.

In addition, the group hoped to form an economic advisory committee of "carefully selected, capable, competent economists," Palmer said.

The President and Vice President endorsed the general principles of the campaign, rather than its specific details.

Mr. Eisenhower assured the group of his "respect and admiration of what you are trying to do." He suggested that they not forget "what telegrams, letters, telephone calls coming in by the millions can do to help the Congress, and the President and the entire organization that he heads, in doing the right thing."

NIXON urged the group to support a balanced budget, whenever this is appropriate, and to support wise management of the national debt.

Another speaker, Senator A. WILLIS ROBERTSON, Democrat, Virginia, chairman of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee, warned that the apparent current price stability could be misleading.

CAMPAIGN AGAINST INFLATION LAUNCHED WITH APPEAL BY IKE

(By S. Oliver Goodman)

Leaders of 48 national organizations started the wheels rolling yesterday to organize a citizens' campaign against inflation.

They acted after hearing an appeal from President Eisenhower to help mobilize public opinion in support of a sound dollar. They also heard Vice President NIXON declare that price stability and economic growth are essential to meet the Soviet's challenge to the free world.

Senator A. WILLIS ROBERTSON, Democrat, of Virginia, chairman of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee, gave his blessing to the group's plan of action in these words:

"I fervently hope that your studies will lead to practical measures" needed to preserve the soundness of the Nation's monetary system.

ARRANGED BY PALMER

The 1-day economic conference, held at the Statler-Hilton Hotel here, was arranged by H. Bruce Palmer, president of the Mutual Benefit Life Insurance Co.

At a breakfast session, Eisenhower discounted any idea that the Government or any particular group is principally responsible for inflationary trends and said:

"Since there are many factors that are common to an economy—and if they are not operated and devised correctly will ruin us—then public opinion must do it, which means self-discipline must do it.

"Otherwise you will have control by Government and imposed discipline. In the long run * * * imposed discipline is dictatorship."

PUBLIC PRESSURE URGED

He discussed means by which public opinion can make itself felt and added:

"I for one hope that you will not forget what telegrams, letters, and phone calls coming in by the millions can do to help the Congress, and the President and the entire organization he heads, in doing the right thing. This, I would feel, would be one of the great services you can now accomplish for the United States."

NIXON, in a luncheon address, emphasized that "unlike the few in the Soviet who make the decisions, ours is a nation where millions of individuals work together in drafting decisions."

Thus, he added, it's necessary to mobilize public opinion in support of Government fiscal policies to combat inflation.

ROBERTSON'S VIEWS

Senator ROBERTSON told the conference that the Federal budget must be kept balanced even if it means additional taxes. He also said: "We should permit the Treasury Department to pay the going rate of interest which will enable it to manage the long-term debt in the most efficient manner."

SPECIAL ORDERS GRANTED

By unanimous consent, permission to address the House, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered, was granted to:

Mr. BOLLING, for 1 hour, on Tuesday, January 26.

Mr. COFFIN, for 1 hour, on Tuesday, January 26.

Mr. COFFIN, for 10 minutes, today, and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.

Mr. MCINTIRE (at the request of Mr. COFFIN), for 10 minutes, today, to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.

Mr. OLIVER (at the request of Mr. COFFIN), for 10 minutes, today, and to revise and extend his remarks.

Mr. REUSS, for 10 minutes, on tomorrow, and to revise and extend his remarks.

Mr. REUSS, for 1 hour, on January 26, following Mr. COFFIN.

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 hour on February 16, following the close of legislative business of the day and any special orders heretofore entered for that day, conditioned on the fact that there is no session of Congress on the 15th of February.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of rule XXII,

311. The SPEAKER presented a petition of Clifford Crail, Cincinnati, Ohio, relative to grievances against Congressman GORDON H. SCHERER of Ohio, the American Express Co., and former Cabinet member Charles Sawyer, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

The Federal Highway Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY FLOOD BYRD

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, January 13, 1960

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an exchange of correspondence between the Secretary of Commerce, the Honorable Frederick H. Mueller, and myself, in regard to the Federal highway program.

There being no objection, the correspondence was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OCTOBER 21, 1959.

Hon. FREDERICK H. MUELLER,
Secretary of Commerce,
Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: The law requires you to make a new estimate of the Federal highway program situation in all its aspects and report your findings and recommendations to Congress immediately after it is convened in January 1961.

This letter is in anticipation of that report. My observations are based on long experience in positions closely connected with the Federal highway program since its inception and 50 years of work for sound progressive highway systems.

I have operated toll roads at a profit when that was not easy. As a Governer, I have planned public highway systems, financed them and administered them. I have helped legislate for them at all levels of government—local, State, and Federal.

Congress in the recent session enacted legislation increasing the Federal gas tax and diverting general revenue to the highway trust fund. As chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, I was called upon to help steer this bill to passage.

I want you and the country to know that I did this job reluctantly; there were two reasons:

1. The legislation was essential to preserve the fiscal integrity of the Federal Government which had been impaired by reckless highway financing policies recommended by the administration and enacted by Congress in 1958; and

2. Both the 1-cent gas tax increase and the general fund diversion were for temporary periods—the gas tax increase to July 1, 1961, and the diversion from that date for 3 years thereafter.

Anticipating your report, I trust you will find: This temporary gas tax increase should not become permanent or the introduction to further increases, temporary or permanent; this temporary diversion of general revenue to the highway trust fund should not become permanent or the introduction to further raids on general revenue taxation, temporary or permanent; that these are special assessments to pay for the sins of profligacy which should come off fully and finally when they expire, if not before; and that with maximum efficiency and economy and a minimum of nonessentials and profiteering, continuing sound progress can be made in meeting our highway transportation requirements on a pay-as-we-go basis.

To me hard experience has proved two fundamental guides to sound, progressive public highway development; they are separate but complementary; they are:

1. No highway system in this country will ever be perfect, or even complete. Highway transportation requirements are not static; they change continually, sometimes rapidly, in terms of location, use, speed, structure, safety, etc., and

2. It is wise to build highways to developing needs on a pay-as-we-go basis. This is the best way to keep abreast of continuing change and build the most modern roads for highway dollars.

I have seen the hazards in trying to anticipate requirements too far in advance and build whole systems too fast on borrowed money. Such practices use highway funds to pay interest instead of building roads, open up wasteful crash program pitfalls, and produce highways which are obsolete before they are paid for.

Mindful of recent experience, I should hope your report will follow these guides. Your Under Secretary, Hon. John J. Allen, Jr., on October 8, said "* * * Past legislation made it possible, unwisely, for us to incur more liability than we have resources to pay;" and "* * * We have just been through the 'morning after' the 1958 binge."

He was referring to the fact that last year, in the name of recession, Federal spenders abandoned the highway pay-as-we-go policy and gorged themselves on authorizations and allocations knowing full well they were exceeding the ability of the trust fund to meet the bills.

No one involved with the suspension of the highway pay-as-we-go policy or the exploitation of the suspension can escape blame for what was done. The administration approved it. Congress enacted it. States were amenable and let the contracts. Contractors bid on the proposals. They all knew they were bankrupting the fund.

Our great highway programs were never before precipitated into such an inexcusable mess. The trust fund was broke and the integrity of the Federal Government was impaired. State highway programs all over the country were seriously disrupted and threatened with chaos.

In further anticipation of your report: I hope it will search out any troubles building up in our Federal-State highway programs as the result of the Interstate System legislation with its 90–10 matching formula—the Federal Government putting up $90 for each $10 supplied by the States.

This is in contrast with the 50–50 matching formula for construction on the so-called ABC system, the backbone of American highway transportation facilities. The temptation to take $90 for $10 is great and the evils of this temptation may be devious.

This is temptation gilded with tremendous Federal funds available to the interstate program. More than $9 billion has already been made available in 5 years for 90–10 matching. The program now seems to be of indefinite duration. And to date the interstate activity has shown many of the loose and wasteful characteristics of a crash program.

It would be unfortunate if some States, seeking more Federal dollars for less State money, yielded to the temptation to divert their funds from 50–50 ABC roads to 90–10 interstate projects. Among other considerations, this could overlook the high cost of many interstate projects where 10 percent may exceed 50 percent of the cost of many ABC projects.

In addition, the States forever must bear the full cost of maintenance for these expensive and complex Interstate System roads. And this is a big permanent cost item which must be calculated in the use of State highway funds in the future.

Rights-of-way acquisition costs are proving to be a tremendous item, running to billions of dollars in the interstate program. The temptation to grab land, hike prices and profiteer is inherent in such a multibillion-dollar, multiyear, 90–10 program. And there is the possibility of collusion and fraud.

Witnesses took the fifth amendment more than 200 times in Senate hearings on land-grabbing on only a few projects in one State. There is evidence in some cases elsewhere that courts have been at least generous with 90–10 money in condemnation cases.

The Comptroller General of the United States has found need for better rights-of-way acquisition policies and better application of existing policies by both the Federal and State Governments. In a program of this magnitude this is especially important for the protection of both the public and the property owner.

Highway engineers generally are highly competent in their profession. They are usually dedicated to building the best if not the ultimate in good roads. But there is temptation to regard this multibillion-dollar, multiyear, 90–10 interstate program as a windfall and a license to go all out with dream designs without limit on expenses.

The Comptroller General has reported that "examination in 11 selected States disclosed considerable variation in design." I suspect this is the Comptroller General's cautious way of saying he has found what he regards as extravagances in so-called geometric design.

I understand geometric design, loosely defined, in contrast with structural design, embraces everything in the highway area which can be seen. In a program of the Interstate System dimensions this is a vast field for expensive highway gingerbread and nonessentials.

There is reason to exercise closest vigilance over all possibilities for irregularity in such a vast undertaking as the interstate program offering so many opportunities for lucrative practice. The need for such vigilance becomes even greater when the program is rushed.

I am sure you are aware of the comment and advice of the Comptroller General on such matters as qualification of bidders, advance information on engineering estimates, overpayment on bond-financed projects, etc. And there is need to watch overlapping with the urban renewal program involving another set of Federal grants along with loans.

Administration of the Federal-State highway programs is extremely complex. Jurisdiction, financing, and engineering frequently are split at all levels of government—State, local, and Federal.

I hope your report will deal frankly with the size and expedited schedule of the Interstate System and the possibility of overtaxing the financial, technical, and administrative facilities at all three levels.

I hope strengthening financial control throughout all levels of government will not await your 1961 report.

I am advised there is good working relationship and cooperation between the Bureau of Public Roads and the U.S. General Accounting Office, and between both Federal agencies and the State governments. This is encouraging. I hope it will be maintained and increased. Otherwise, I fear for the entire program.

I am writing to you in this manner and at this time because I have deep interest in our highway system, and as matters now stand I have deep concern.

I sincerely hope that you and the States will get on top of this interstate program, shake all excessive costs, planning and crash aspects out of it, and report in January 1961 that reasonable progress can be made at reasonable cost.

You will recall that the Clay Commission in 1954 estimated the Interstate System basically would cost $23 billion. This estimate was revised to $27.6 billion in 1955. Now the program has been revised and the estimate raised to $39.9 billion to complete 40,000 miles in the system.

This is an increase of $16.9 billion, or more than 73 percent in 5 years. And State highway officials have testified that only about a fourth of the increase has been due to the 12-percent rise in costs of materials and labor. The rest has been due largely to change in designs and expansion of the program.

On the basis of the kind of experience we have had with the Interstate System to date, it is not difficult for me to foresee costs rising to a point in excess of $50 billion by 1975, the presently scheduled completion date.

The present estimate is too much. I trust you find it can be reduced.

With my high personal regards.

Faithfully yours,

HARRY F. BYRD.

NOVEMBER 13, 1959.

DEAR SENATOR BYRD: This is in further reply to your letter of October 21 which I acknowledged briefly on October 22 expressing my general accord with your philosophy of highway policy. I take this opportunity to comment further on your very fine letter.

The events of the past year have taught many of us a great deal about highway problems, and have shown us the need for more thoughtful consideration of the fundamental background of highway policy. These considerations, of course, have been common knowledge to you for a long time, and as I read your letter I began to realize fully the depth of experience from which you speak on highway policy; an experience that spans the entire period of Federal highway aid at the three levels of our American system of government.

During the past year, as you have observed, our main problem was to get out from under the chaos resulting from the Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1958, an act which suspended your provision for pay-as-you-go financing and which raised authorizations for highway aid far beyond the revenue capacity of the Highway Trust Fund. You will recall the sponsorship of that legislation by members of the majority party of the Congress, against your advice and the warnings issued by spokesmen of this Department during the hearings. You will also recollect the misgivings of the President when he finally decided to approve the bill, in order to avoid the greater evil of not having any highway legislation. Early this year the administration promptly sought to put the highway program on a sound financial basis through a tax increase proposal. A part of what you describe as an inexcusable mess was caused by the procrastination of many responsible leaders of Congress in facing the highway issue. It was only the determination of the administration and the support of conservative leadership including your own valued support that finally brought about a change in attitude in the final days of the session.

We cannot afford to allow another such highway crisis. To avoid another such affair we must bend every effort to improve the direction of highway policy and to revamp the entire system of financial management. The entire administration is dedicated to an effort to bring about these improvements in the highway program.

From our experience of the past session we all realize that the highway program has become so big that the former methods of highway policy determination no longer suffice. It cannot, as in former years, be considered exclusively the affair of one committee in each House, or of one bureau in the executive branch. Highways and Federal highway expenditures touch the fiscal policy of the Nation in a major way, they touch the basic formulation of budgets and appropriations, and they affect our national transportation policy as well as our whole manner of national living.

In the Congress highway policy has become a major concern of the Committee of Finance and Ways and Means, the Appropriations Committees, and from these important committees the concern of the leadership of the entire Congress. In the administration, highway policy has claimed an increasing share of the attention of the Secretary of Commerce, the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, the Secretary of the Treasury, the White House staff, and the President himself. Each major development in highway policy is a serious public issue for which our national leadership is now held responsible.

In the narrower field of management there is also a new factor which affects highway administrative actions, including the historic Federal-State relations in this field. The new element is trust fund financing.

Whereas in former years, a small highway program was guaranteed by the vast resources of the General Fund of the Treasury, the present large highway program is guaranteed by a rather limited group of special tax revenues. Inherent in such a financial arrangement is the need for a tighter process of financial controls in which the scope of programs of construction is geared specifically to forward estimates of available cash in the Highway Trust Fund. The circular memorandum which I attached to my previous letter may serve as the first step in the development of such a system of financial controls, in addition to its present function of meeting the immediate crisis in the Highway Trust Fund. This Department is cooperating with the staff of the Bureau of the Budget in perfecting this "controllership" system of financial management.

In addition to the financial management improvement just noted, the Department and other parts of the administration are doing important work in the broader field of highway policy evaluation with the objective of putting our national highway system on a sounder basis.

I should first mention the study provided in section 210 of the Federal-aid Highway Act of 1956, which is in addition to the cost estimate for the Interstate System which you noted in your letter. The section 210 study, due in March 1961, is intended to provide recommendations for a sounder policy for financing highways, including the appropriate amounts, the distribution among jurisdictions, the types of revenues, and the equity of their assessment among groups of taxpayers. This study was intended to overcome the most serious deficiency in the 1956 Highway Act, the lack of an adequate financial structure for the augmented highway construction effort. The revenue structure thrown together in 1956 has not been adequate to carry us through even this initial period, and even without the added difficulties posed by the 1958 Highway Act, we would have had to reduce interstate apportionments this year. The 1961 report will raise serious questions, not only with respect to financial resources, but also of program emphasis due to financial requirements and proper responsibility among jurisdictions and user groups for highway costs. Some of these problems are being reconsidered in the administration even now.

The White House staff, the Bureau of the Budget, and this Department are engaged in a general progress review of the interstate highway program, seeking to determine if the present program emphasis is in line with the original intent or if new factors have developed which require modification of the program. We are concentrating in the difficult area of urban construction. Here we are looking both at the responsibility of the 90–10 interstate program for specified types of construction and the engineering standards and criteria that are being used. Out of this administration study we hope to gain some insight into the problems you raised in your letter, whether there are extravagances in geometric design and whether some of the costs of specific designs are more properly chargeable to other programs than the Interstate System.

While we are busy with our evaluations of strictly highway matters, we in the Department are not unmindful of our responsibility for national transportation policy in the executive branch and the relation of highways thereto. In his last budget message the President charged the Secretary of Commerce to make a fundamental study of national transportation policy to assure that none of our activities in the transportation field are working at cross-purposes. One of the important phases of that study, now nearing completion, is an evaluation of the methods used in programing public investment in transportation facilities, both from the standpoint of sound methods and relation to general transportation needs. You should be pleased to know that our principal consultant on this phase of our project is from the University of Virginia.

The field of transportation policy, particularly the part where public investment is essential, requires an unrelenting effort in behalf of sound management. The sums involved are a constant temptation for self-serving ends, while the technical nature of much of the activity tends to remove it from the immediate attention of the legislative leader or the administration policy leaders. I believe that the Department of Commerce is in a unique position to make a contribution to sound management in these fields, being specialized enough to supervise the technical aspects of these programs and yet concerned enough with the general policy to see that the public interest is served. As Secretary of Commerce, I hope to be able to perfect our departmental machinery to serve both ends.

This coming session of Congress may see many attacks made on the objectives of sound policy in the highway field. With the preparations I have described, the administration and the Department of Commerce will not enter this expected battle unarmed. From your past record in behalf of sound management, I know you will join with other stalwart supporters of sound policies to fend off the attacks on our solvency, regardless of the odds. Let us hope that our combined efforts can be used effectively to preserve a sound highway policy.

Sincerely yours,

F. H. MUELLER,
Secretary of Commerce.

Security With Solvency

OF
HON. JOSEPH S. CLARK
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, January 13, 1960

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a very able article entitled "Security With Solvency," written by our colleague the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SYMINGTON], and published in the November 26 issue of the Reporter magazine.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SECURITY WITH SOLVENCY—A DEMOCRATIC LEADER'S CRITIQUE OF THE UNBUSINESSLIKE "BUSINESSMAN'S ADMINISTRATION"

(By Senator STUART SYMINGTON)

Can the United States maintain an adequate defense and insure the well-being of its own people without jeopardizing its economy? This question arose time and again during the recent session of Congress—a session in which concern for a balanced budget and fear of deficit financing dominated nearly every debate on public expenditures.

It is a vital question. To provide security—in the broadest sense of that term—while maintaining national solvency poses a challenge to our skill in self-government. With the great burden that our defense program makes necessary, we have reason to make all the economies that are possible by sound and able management of our Government programs. I believe it is possible for Republican and Democrat alike to agree on this even though they may still disagree about whether the present level of Government expenditures is a sacrosanct figure revealed from on high as the absolute measure of the Nation's needs.

HOW MUCH IS WASTED?

From its beginning the Eisenhower administration has paid lipservice to the concept of security with solvency and, as a businessman's administration, promised to conduct the affairs of Government on an efficient, economical basis. Judged by its own criteria, it has been a colossal and expensive failure. It has not only cut into the bone of essential programs without achieving necessary economies; its mismanagement has positively contributed to wasteful expenditures that could have been used to good purpose. Despite rumblings of protest from many in a position to know, the policies and programs of the present administration are wasting tens of millions of the taxpayers' dollars every week. Billions of dollars are being squandered that otherwise could be invested in the public facilities needed to keep abreast of our growing population. As a result, worthwhile programs for schools, dams, highways, medical research, etc., are dismissed by the administration as contributing to budgetary imbalance.

When a government finds its expenditures crowding its revenues, and senses popular disapproval of tax increases, it can embrace one of two solutions. The first is retrenchment. This has been the answer of the present administration, which has drastically pared social-welfare programs and decreed no new starts in public facilities.

The second solution is more difficult. It involves more patient effort, discipline, and leadership. It means that the conflicting interests which pull government programs in different directions must be met with decisions instead of wasteful compromises. It means the constant weeding out of inefficient practices in government departments. It involves rejection of the prevalent notion that waste must be tolerated as an inevitable part of the cost of any public enterprise.

The application of management principles to government is difficult, but its dividends are great. The money thus saved, I believe, could go a long way toward providing America with the investments it needs.

Let us consider four areas of present expenditure: agriculture, government finance, foreign aid, and defense. I select these four because they make up some $62 billion of this year's expenditures, or about 80 percent of the total budget. These four areas pose a common indictment of the waste brought on by the Eisenhower administration's decisions, or just as wasteful, its failure to make decisions.

1. In agriculture

Since assuming office in 1953, Ezra Taft Benson has spent more money than was spent by all of the previous Secretaries of Agriculture put together since the Department was established in 1889. He has managed to do this without raising farm income or lowering food costs to the housewife. The farm problem has grown into what has been called "the most critical, perilous, unresolved domestic problem facing the United States."

The $31 billion spent on the farm program since 1952 has involved increases in many areas. Administrative costs of the price-support program since that year have multiplied more than tenfold from $34 million a year to $364 million. The number of employees in the Department of Agriculture has increased from 66,000 to 85,000.

But the greatest increase in spending—running into billions of dollars—comes from the Government's failure to manage agricultural surpluses properly. This in turn results from failure to understand the business operation of the typical family farmer who operates the great majority of the farms of America.

The administration has followed a policy of lowering price supports on the theory that this would reduce production. Any true understanding of the way farmers operate would show that it has the opposite effect. Farmers have fixed costs—mortgage payments, farm machinery, installment payments, and the like—most of which have increased with the cost of living and the cost of money. In order to meet these higher costs when price supports are reduced, they must produce more. Unless there are effective controls on production, they take advantage of technological advances to increase production as much as possible.

Under the administration's policies this is precisely what has happened. In each of the last 6 years, farm production has increased, leaving the Government holding an inventory of farm commodities which has cost over $9 billion and which by January 1961, will be over $12 billion. Storage costs alone on this inventory amount to a billion dollars a year.

This sad situation was foreseeable and correctible. Why then did it happen? The unavoidable evidence is that the administration has stooped to play politics with the farm program time after time, has refused to impose meaningful production controls, and, despite continuing criticisms by Congress, has never come up with a concrete program to correct the situation.

Instead, makeshift actions have only aggravated the problem. Last year, for example, with Government warehouses and bins stuffed with a billion and a half bushels of surplus corn, the Secretary of Agriculture recommended a corn program that not only removed all limitations on production but actually increased the price support on more than 90 percent of the corn produced in the United States. The Department now estimates that its new program will result in the record-shattering production of 4.5 billion bushels this year; at least 500 million additional bushels will end up in Government warehouses.

This year, Congress passed a wheat bill that would have reduced wheat production by 20 percent and cut down Government wheat inventories by hundreds of millions of bushels. The savings to taxpayers would have been at least $260 million annually—enough to build 6,500 needed classrooms. But the President vetoed the bill.

The handling of this enormous food inventory has been mismanaged. The administration, by its own admission, has negotiated and signed contracts for the storage of grain without first studying what this storage would cost. It has sold commodities from Government stocks to private companies at a low price, and then allowed those same companies to sell them abroad at much higher prices, in transactions the Government itself financed.

The irony is that the administration's policies have hurt the farmer, particularly the small farmer, instead of helping him. In fact, though farm families constitute 12 percent of the Nation's population, their share of the national income has now fallen to 3.5 percent, a new low.

2. In Government finance

By January of 1958, the Nation had already been through the first 4 months of what was to prove a prolonged economic recession. Some of the clearly predictable effects of a recession upon Government finance are shrinkage of anticipated tax revenues and increased demands for expenditure upon the Government. These were not reflected in the budget for the next fiscal year, to begin in less than 6 months, that the President submitted to Congress on January 13. Instead, it contained an estimate that the Government would be operated at a budget surplus of about $500 million. This estimate turned out to be in error by approximately $13 billion. Instead of a surplus of $500 million, the Government incurred the largest peacetime deficit in the country's history, even though Congress appropriated $617 million less than the President had requested.

During the past 5 fiscal years, the Federal Government has been operated at a net deficit of about $17 billion. This also is far above any deficit ever experienced in this country over a comparable period during which we were not at war. Despite the widely held belief to the contrary, this deficit was not the fault of Congress, which in these years appropriated $10.6 billion less than the President requested.

The increased Government borrowing resulting from these years of deficit has increased the national debt from $266.1 billion at the end of the fiscal year 1953 to the present figure of about $290 billion. If the taxpayer is to be protected, such a large debt must be managed with great care. Like any prudent business concern, the Treasury should try to finance its debt at the lowest possible interest rates.

But from the beginning, the Treasury of this administration has violated this simple rule of debt management. Early in 1953, the Treasury Department raised the interest rate on Government bonds to 3¼ percent. This was substantially above the minimum interest rate needed to sell the bonds. Even 2 years later, in spite of a general upward trend of interest rates, potential buyers oversubscribed a 40-year Government bond issue offered at the lower rate of 3 percent.

This imprudent practice has been followed time and again during the last 3 years. Offerings of the Treasury at lower rates than the present limit were oversubscribed by the public, but the Treasury continued its policy of issuing a far smaller amount of bonds than the evidence showed the market would absorb. Only last March, for example, the Treasury opened the subscription books for a 4 percent 12-year bond. The public offered to buy $1.5 billion worth, but the Treasury had limited the subscription to only $619 million. Again in February, 1958, investors made bids totaling $6 billion on a subscription of a 3 percent 8½-year bond. But the Treasury had limited the sale to only $1.5 billion.

Of course, no one can state with absolute certainty what the money market will accept. But the administration has shown a continuing hesitancy about getting a good bargain for its bonds. Its own sense of insecurity has created insecurity in the market—has, in fact, helped push up the price of money. When the Treasury appealed to Congress this June for authority to increase interest rates, it did so despite the fact that many times during the last 2 years it passed up the chance to refinance the debt at lower rates.

With such management, is it any wonder that the interest cost of the national debt has increased from $6.6 billion in the fiscal year 1953 to an estimated $8.6 billion for the fiscal year 1960? If our financial management had been conducted on a businesslike basis during the past 6 years, I believe the interest burden to the taxpayer would be at least a billion dollars less a year.

The other important phase of financial management is the collection of taxes. There is a great deal of evidence that if our collections were handled more efficiently we could be raising billions more in taxes at current tax rates. In fact, earlier this year, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue told Congress that $25 to $26 billion of income each year was not being reported by taxpayers. The Commissioner also testified that every new tax-enforcement agent brings in, in 1 year, 10 to 15 times his salary for searching out this unreported income.

Faced with such a sure prospect of increased revenue, any prudent businessman would work hard to collect it. But not this administration. Since 1952, it has actually cut 3,000 enforcement personnel from the staff of the Internal Revenue Service. The staff is so small today most returns cannot even be checked to see if they were computed correctly. Fewer than 5 percent are given a thorough audit. Nevertheless, on the grounds of economy, this year the administration, in a prize example of false economy, continued to oppose all but the smallest increase in funds for additional enforcement.

3. In mutual security

Over the past few years reports have come from abroad about great waste in the administration of our mutual security program. These reports have come not just from the opponents of foreign aid. Senator FULBRIGHT, perhaps its greatest champion in the Senate and as knowledgeable a man on international relations as we have, has cited various examples of his own. They include a $5 million hospital in France that was built but never opened.

Most of this waste is not due to corruption, and bad management by our overseas personnel is far from the whole explanation. Many of our foreign-assistance programs have gone wrong because the people in charge of them could not plan projects beyond the limiting 12-month period. Public-works projects start, then stop and hang in abeyance waiting for word from Washington whether the new budget will allow them to proceed. Underdeveloped countries have been reluctant to request loans for the most important wealth-producing projects, such as dams and railroads, because these require longer term financing than our aid program has offered.

Largely for this reason, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee proposed this year to put the Development Loan Fund on a long-term basis, with authority to borrow from the Treasury. Such long-term planning is one of the simplest requirements of any successful business. If a private corporation could not plan confidently beyond a 12-month period, its development would be bogged down in uncertainty and waste. It would be judged guilty of exceedingly bad management.

This principle of fiscal foresight is already recognized in other programs of our Government. At least 13 public agencies borrow from the Treasury in this manner. Nevertheless, the administration opposed granting such authority to the Development Loan Fund. As a result, we will spend almost a billion dollars a year in this field without the kind of long-term planning that will make it effective and economic.

4. In Defense

For our own military forces we are now spending about $41 billion a year—more than half our total budget. Nearly $5 billion more is being expended annually for such additional national security items as atomic energy, military assistance to other countries, and strategic stockpiles. Not many Americans realize how heavy is the price the taxpayer is paying for the duplication, service rivalry, inefficient organization, and resultant waste now characteristic of our defense operations.

One example: During fiscal 1959 alone, the three services together spent more than $4 billion for the development, production, and manning of a continental air defense system against possible enemy bombers. In other words, we spend almost $11 million a day for defenses against a small number of Soviet bombers. But these defenses are useless against such modern offensive weapons as long-range ballistic missiles or shorter-range guided and ballistic missiles launched from submarines.

By far the greatest waste in government today can be traced to the obsolete organizational structure of the Department of Defense, an organization that cannot possibly function efficiently. Most of our prominent military leaders, including General Eisenhower until he became President, have asserted that unless our defenses are reorganized on the basis of progress rather than tradition, this Nation could well go broke.

As an illustration, we are currently being obliged to support a variety of air forces: the Army air force, the Navy air force, the Air Force air force, the Marine air force, plus the Military Air Transport Service. In addition we support, in whole or in part, various reserve components such as CRAF (civil air reserve) and the Civil Air Patrol. Instead of one group of land combat forces, we support two, the Army and the Marine Corps, plus the reserve components for both of them.

As a result of the waste all this duplication entails, the taxpayer is getting a very small combat force at very high cost. These various organizations are in active competition in weapons systems, in the bidding for skilled personnel, and in the struggle for the most desirable engineering and production facilities.

Despite the fact the science of warfare has changed more in the last 15 years than in the previous thousand, we have not conducted a genuine weapons-system evaluation since the end of the Second World War. That failure in itself has cost the American taxpayer tens of millions of dollars a week. Hundreds of millions of dollars have been spent on each of many specific weapons systems. Then the projects have either been drastically curtailed or canceled. In most cases the cancellations and curtailments have not been based upon evidence that the weapons systems were not needed; they have been the result of the overriding priority given fiscal objectives by this administration.

To cite just a few of the numerous examples:

The Navy spent almost $400 million on the development of the Seamaster (P6M)—a long-range amphibious bomber. This project was canceled in August of this year, during the early stages of the preparation of the fiscal 1961 budget.

The Regulus II is a Navy supersonic air-breathing missile, which the Chief of Naval Operations called the best of its kind in existence. It was developed, proven, and then produced in small quantities. After several hundred million dollars had been spent, the project was canceled during the last stages of the preparation of the fiscal 1960 budget.

The Air Force and the Navy spent about $250 million on facilities and materials for the development of fuel applications of boron. After such expenditures, the new facilities have been left idle, and the project has been reduced to a small-scale research operation.

It is not hard to understand why this start-and-stop financing takes place. Each service is trying to prepare itself to wage any possible future war by itself. The duplication and waste resulting from such loose management is costing us billions.

Failure to reorganize for the nuclear and space age has compounded the waste of funds and skills. A prominent member of this administration warned that unless the friction and duplication between the National Aeronautics and Space Administration and the Defense Department were eliminated soon, the taxpayers would be losing at least $3 billion annually in that field alone.

Last spring, after examining the Government's organization for space activities, a Senate subcommittee issued a unanimous report with nine specific recommendations for improving administration. It stated: "Failure to act promptly on the above-listed inadequacies will not only result in additional waste of time, money, and skilled personnel, but also will impair both our national security and our international prestige." The final conclusion in this unanimous report was: "Space activities within the Department of Defense cannot be managed effectively by changes in the organization and administration of the space program alone. Such changes can only be effective if they are an integrated part of a further unification of the services within the Department of Defense."

This present ineffective organization and management brings into disrepute the entire military structure of the country. Direct and indirect derogatory publicity degrades the competence and missions of the rival services. But what is more important, it does not give us the security we should be buying with such a large expenditure.

The transition to the nuclear space age will not be cheap. But a first step that any prudent management should attempt is to make certain that the Government's dollar is being well spent.

The savings possible in the four areas I have discussed could total $10 billion. Among other things such funds could finance:

The slum-clearance and urban-renewal program of the U.S. Conference of Mayors ($600 million).

The expenditure of the original Murray-Metcalf aid-to-education bill ($4.4 billion).

Twice the Senate's recommendation for medical research ($800 million).

A doubling of authorized funds for hospital construction under the Hill-Burton program ($420 million).

The maximum Senate-committee programs for depressed areas ($400 million) and modernization of airports ($115 million).

Governments have no profit-and-loss guidelines, nor are they as limited in the ways they can meet the demands of creditors. The concessions and compromises of the political process often induce duplication and flabby practices. I believe, however, that our Government could perform its proper functions, far more effectively and with solvency, if in our approach to the problem we would emphasize better management instead of retrenchment. With a hard new discipline, and with a policy of taking the people in as partners in knowledge of the true nature of our problem, it can be done.

Mr. McGEE subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article entitled "Security With Solvency," written by the distinguished junior Senator from Missouri, the Honorable STUART SYMINGTON, and published in the December issue of Reporter magazine.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McGEE. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I may advise the Senator from Wyoming that I placed that article in the RECORD earlier today.

Mr. McGEE. Then, Mr. President, I withdraw my request and only reiterate, in commendatory language of my own, the wisdom of reading with care Senator SYMINGTON'S forthright, direct assault on some of the embarrassing fiscal policies which confront the country today.

The International Cultural Exchange Program

OF

HON. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, January 13, 1960

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, many times in the past I have been proud to associate myself with the legislation on arts and culture introduced by Representative FRANK THOMPSON, JR., of New Jersey. In particular, I recall our bill passed by the 84th Congress to ensure that the President's international cultural exchange program would become permanent policy.

It is to the administration of that law—Public Law 860–84—that the distinguished Representative from New Jersey referred in a speech before the American Educational Theater Association on December 28, 1959. Representative THOMPSON said:

Under the current program of the President's international cultural exchange program as administered by the Department of State, of 115 attractions which have been sent abroad, only a half-dozen or less than 6 percent, have been educational talent—university or college theater or music groups. * * * This program is so weighted with professionals that it might justly be called the 6 percent program rather than the President's international cultural exchange program. It should also be noted that there is no cultural exchange in the program at all.

Ambassador Llewellyn Thompson in Moscow and Ambassador Ellsworth Bunker in Delhi have requested the State Department to send young educational talent in the arts to Russian and India, hoping to repeat the success of Van Cliburn, for example. However, the administration has only talked about this exchange and no young talent has been sent to either of these countries.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this fine speech on recruitment of educational cultural talent for our exchange program be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

ADDRESS BY CONGRESSMAN FRANK THOMPSON, JR., OF NEW JERSEY, BEFORE THE AMERICAN EDUCATIONAL THEATER ASSOCIATION, DELIVERED IN WASHINGTON, D.C., ON DECEMBER 28, 1959

Dr. Young, Dr. Cole, Dr. Selden, Dr. Morrison, distinguished friends and guests, it is an honor and a pleasure for me to have this opportunity to discuss with such a select group some of the pressing problems and suggested solutions which this 23d annual convention of the American Educational Theater Association must deal with. My remarks might well be titled "Democracy Needs a Broader Cultural Emphasis," since they are especially directed to the need for stimulating a more widespread cultural awareness in the United States and in sharing this enthusiasm with people throughout the world. I think it particularly important that we understand that our approach to the arts must be one of sharing them with other peoples, rather than one of using the arts for political ends. For if our primary purpose in our national policy is political we shall fail. Political results may very well follow as a result of sharing the arts, as indeed they have followed the educational exchanges authorized by the Fulbright and Smith-Mundt Acts. But in the arts as in education, it must be primarily a matter of exchanges, and this is something that is entirely missed in Washington these days due to a belief that everything from breakfast cereals to our way of life can be "sold."

The American Educational Theater Association can exert a tremendous force for the stimulation of a significant cultural impact which could be felt both in this country and abroad. Through positive action your association in effective cooperation with other cultural organizations, can with imagination, purposefulness and hard work, effect a cultural renascence. This will require your wholehearted direction, support, and effort—for as Walter Lippmann has pointed out "the renascence will have to come from men of learning"—men who know, because they live the intellectual life, what a renascence would be. However, before we can achieve this goal of a fuller cultural awakening there are obstacles to be overcome. It is my desire today to discuss some of the areas, nationally and internationally, in which your particular kind of leadership is specifically required.

Just recently, for example, Richard B. McLanathan, who was the curator of the U.S. art exhibit at the Moscow Fair (now director of the community arts program of the Munson-Williams-Proctor Institute at Utica, N.Y.), reported to the United States Information Agency and other Government agencies that he found throughout Europe and the U.S.S.R. that people were looking to the United States for cultural leadership. People are looking for evidence that the United States will not only take up Mr. Khrushchev's challenge regarding economic competition, he said, but that we also will demonstrate more fully than we have done so far that we have "a lot to spare in the aesthetic and cultural field as well.

Mr. McLanathan further reported, I am told, that people throughout the world believed that the United States and its allies could withstand any economic or political pressures which the Soviet Union and its satellites might exert. We can do this, they are convinced, only if we are strong culturally. According to Mr. McLanathan, the people of the world believe the United States and the U.S.S.R. offset each other in the economic area. Their decision to follow either the United States or the U.S.S.R. ultimately will depend, he thinks, on the balance sheet evidence of cultural resources and leadership. History clearly documents the fact that civilizations are remembered more for their contributions to the fine arts, to music, the theater, to literature, to painting and sculpture and architecture than they are remembered by the battles which they have fought. It is my belief, and I know it can be documented, that one of the major ways in which we can turn reluctant and uneasy military allies—and the millions of uncommitted people of the world—into friends is to earn their respect through our own respect for our own cultural leadership and achievements in the deeply related fields of education, science, and the fine arts.

As we know, President Eisenhower is a leading exponent of this point of view. In his speeches in India, for example, he called for a massive interchange of mutual understanding through exchange of students. I might add, parenthetically, that he also took the lead in forming a very effective Committee of the Arts and Sciences for Eisenhower in the fall of 1956.

For a number of years, 10 in fact, the great value of exchanging students, the leaders of tomorrow's world, has been proved by the successful Fulbright and Smith-Mundt programs. A massive expansion of these and other programs will be a welcome and valuable step toward creating the international understanding so essential to a permanent peace. Dare we hope that the forthcoming budget message of the President will request the funds which will be needed to finance the President's massive exchange? I look forward anxiously to the opportunity to vote for such a program. My colleagues and I would, I am sure, be much more willing to appropriate the additional funds needed to implement these massive exchanges if the State Department shows the same good judgment it has displayed in the Fulbright and Smith-Mundt programs and work with and through our country's major educational organizations for the implementation of these new exchanges which the President has called for.

I am concerned, however, that the President has endorsed massive exchanges as a grand design because I question how well this will actually be carried out in the field of exchanges in the arts—your association's particular interest—as long as all public funds for cultural and artistic exchanges are channeled through one organization, the American National Theater and Academy, and no other organization, even the American Educational Theater Association, or the National Music Council which—like ANTA—has a congressional charter, is permitted to develop any know-how in this vital area because of the restrictive practices of the Department of State. Yet, at the same time, the leading educational organizations such as the American Council on Education and the National Education Association, and the Institute of International Education, are given a major role by the State Department in the Fulbright and Smith-Mundt programs.

To illustrate what I have in mind, under the current program of the President's international cultural exchange program as administered in the Department of State by Mr. James Magdanz of 115 attractions which have been sent abroad only a half dozen, or less than 6 percent, have been educational talent—university or college theater or music groups. In my opinion, and also in the opinion of such important national groups as the National Education Association, the National Association of Schools of Music, the National Music Camp at the University of Michigan, the Music Educators National Conference, the National Art Education Association—to name only a few—this program is so weighted with professionals that it might justly be called the 6-percent program rather than the President's international cultural exchange program. It should also be noted that there is no cultural exchange in the program at all, as there is in the Fulbright and Smith-Mundt programs. So we now find that many of the Nation's most talented performers, its young artists, who could be our country's most successful cultural ambassadors, witness Van Cliburn, are actually used less than 6 percent of the time.

For the record I will read from some of the glowing newspaper and official reports on the success of the performances of our university theater groups who have toured abroad just in case Mr. Magdanz and Mr. Robert H. Thayer, Special Assistant to the Secretary of State for the Coordination of International Educational and Cultural Relations, missed them. The reaction of people in Latin America, India, and parts of Africa was significant. These accounts prove beyond a shadow of a doubt the great and lasting impact America's talented young artists are making wherever they are given the opportunity to appear by our cloistered policy-makers.

"The visit of the University of Minnesota players to Sao Paulo was a success from every point of view," we are advised by the American Consulate General. "They attained a level of the best professionals in many countries in Latin America," according to the Diario de Sao Paulo.

The American Embassy, New Delhi, reported home that the Wayne State University Players were "a fine group and did an amazing job in the face of many vicissitudes while they were in Delhi. Their performances were excellent. They met people well and were eager and enthusiastic in their contacts with Indian students and other play groups. They made an outstanding contribution, with a grueling schedule, to the feeling of good will and in the advancement of knowledge about the American university drama."

The American Embassy in Ghana reported that the Florida A. & M. University Players "had a net effect favorable to the United States. * * * The players were quite effective in their social relations with Ghanaians before and after their performances, and left many fast friends behind them when they left Ghana." This report is supported by the comment in the Ghanaian that "Their visit is a fine example of what can be done by actors who love the theater and are willing to give their spare time to not only the glamorous side of it but also to the equally exacting tasks of stage management and general organization."

Clearly, talented groups of this type can be a major asset to the United States in its program to give the peoples of the world a broader understanding of America's culture and purposes. As you know so well, since you pioneered it, the Department of Defense sends a large number of college and university drama and music groups abroad to entertain our troops in distant theaters of operation. These groups are much more popular with our troops than most professional entertainers. When they are abroad on these tours why doesn't the State Department and the U.S. Information Service cultural affairs officers schedule them for appearances before young people of the countries in the countries they are visiting, including university audiences, thus saving tax money and spreading America's message at one and the same time?

I think it is significant to note that early in October at the very time that Mr. Robert H. Thayer (special assistant to the Secretary of State) was speaking in New York City to the President's Music Committee about the difficulty of including young educational talent from our institutions of higher education in the President's special international cultural exchange program he was advising Members of Congress that Ambassador Llewellyn Thompson had requested that such young educational talent in the arts be sent to Moscow. Ambassador Thompson was moved, no doubt, to make this request by the astonishing success of Van Cliburn, a Juilliard graduate, who, by the way, received absolutely no financial help from the President's program. His expenses were paid with funds raised by the Institute of International Education from the Martha Baird Rockefeller Fund. Mr. Thayer also told us that Ambassador Ellsworth Bunker had requested that young educational talent in the arts be sent to India. What then becomes of the classic defense of the Department of State of its present program's virtual exclusion of young people: that American cultural affairs officers and top Embassy people have demanded the great professional groups and don't want educational talent? The State Department, by the way, has done nothing to date about these significant requests by the American Ambassadors in the U.S.S.R. and India except to study them.

The agreement for cultural exchanges with the Soviet Union includes a provision for "university exchanges of faculty and students," and clearly this agreement doesn't rule out educational talent in the arts. There is no reason why we cannot work out this particular type of exchange of educational talent with the U.S.S.R. and other Iron Curtain countries, just as we have with so many other countries under the Fulbright and Smith-Mundt programs where between 3,000 to 4,000 of the 35,000 to 40,000 exchangees during the past 10 years have been in the arts. That this is so is shown by a New York Times article of December 25, 1959, to the effect that one of the U.S. students who went to the Soviet Union last September is studying at the Moscow Musical Conservatory. The New York Times says:

"The U.S. Government is understood to be strongly in favor of continuing and enlarging the student exchange program. Officials remark that the American students during their academic year in Moscow or Leningrad are able to befriend more Russians than any American diplomat or news correspondent can do during his entire service in the Soviet Union.

"Young Americans and Russians are reported to be establishing personal contacts in lecture halls, libraries, cafeterias, and dormitories of Soviet institutions of higher learning with ease and eagerness. This alone, in the opinion of United States officials, would be sufficient for justifying the entire exchange program and advocating its expansion. * * *

"Kenneth Holland, president of the Institute of International Education here, declared that 'it is important for us to have students who know the U.S.S.R., even if they do not advance in their specific fields in the course of their Russian year.

"Mr. Holland talked with many American students during a visit to the Soviet Union earlier this year. He said he was impressed with their knowledge of Russian affairs and had found that despite the limitations they were encountering their experience was invaluable."

If President Eisenhower's call for massive exchanges is to be carried out with maximum effect then the United States should embark upon a broad program to provide two-way cultural exchanges with all nations, with particular emphasis on young people. You will be pleased to know that Senator HUBERT H. HUMPHREY, Democrat, of Minnesota, Representative HARRIS B. MCDOWELL, Democrat, of Delaware, and I have introduced legislative proposals (S. 1827; H.R. 6876 and H.R. 7533) to put this type of program into effect. We want to see the Humphrey-Thompson Act (Public Law 860, 84th Cong., which made the President's special international cultural exchange program permanent) amended to specifically provide for more widespread cultural exchange of young artists and art groups, and we think that at least 50 percent of the funds appropriated for this program should be devoted to young Americans if the President's call for massive exchanges is to have any real meaning. We hope President Eisenhower will support this, and that he will call in his budget message next month for an immediate raising of the present picayune $2 million to an amount respectably nearer the $20 million which he annually requests for the Fulbright and Smith-Mundt programs.

I was very pleased to hear that the Young Democratic Clubs of America, at their recent national convention, adopted a resolution which urges the Republican adminstration to utilize the power they have been given not only to send throughout the world our large artistic groups and universally accepted artists whose appeal is primarily to the sophisticated audiences of the world's capitals, but also the groups with fine artistic merit who would represent our local creativity and to include in the exchange program, as was intended by the sponsors of the legislation, young artists of great merit.

I completely support the idea that we should create and help finance with Federal funds university circuits at home and abroad. Such programs would certainly more fully display our cultural achievements and assets as well as help us learn more about the people of other nations. Here the sharing of our cultural resources with the people of other nations, which I mentioned earlier, would have significant meaning and results. In my considered view, the question of whether one or another great American orchestra plays with that extra shade of polish, and is a fraction better in its technique than a similar great aggregation in Europe or the Soviet Union cannot compare with the importance of reaching and influencing the leaders of tomorrow's world through our young American student exchanges in all fields.

For this reason, the national showcase program which my colleague, Representative HARRIS B. MCDOWELL, JR., has recently espoused, and which passed the House of Representatives with the help of the leaders of the American Educational Theater Association in 1952 and was passed over without prejudice in the Senate at the same time, is a plan which has my wholehearted support. For years I have wanted to see our talented young American artists given more recognition on the national scene and particularly through a program in the Nation's Capital by which their talents could be displayed to the Nation and the world.

As a corollary, then, to a national showcase program there should be a worldwide Olympiad of the Arts and Sciences held regularly in Washington, D.C., which would afford competition between talented young people from all nations. Such an arts and sciences competition could sponsor contests for awards in piano, cello, violin, youth orchestras, choral and chamber groups, ballet, folk dancing, and other forms of the dance such as ballet in which the U.S.S.R. excels, painting, sculpture, readings, and drama and poetry presentations. It is also desirable that under this program comparable talent competitions in the Nation's Capital be held in mathematics, physics, biology, and the other sciences. These Olympiads should be judged by an international jury of renowned artists and specialists in the various fields. The winners would immediately attain international recognition and be awarded substantial prizes. It is quite reasonable to assume, I have been advised by Dr. Oliver J. Caldwell, Assistant Commissioner for International Education, U.S. Office of Education, a long-time and able advocate of the proposal for a worldwide Olympiad of the Arts and Sciences, that such an international Olympiad program, if carefully planned, would be as significant as the Nobel Prize Awards in the years to come. As President Eisenhower said at Delhi University in India:

"More enduringly than from the deliberations of high councils, I believe mankind will profit when young men and women of all nations and in great numbers study and learn together. In so doing, they will concern themselves with the problems, possibilities, resources, and rewards of their common destiny.

"Through the centuries nations have sent their youth armed for war to oppose their neighbors. Let us in this day look on our youth, eager for a larger and clearer knowledge, as forces for international understanding; and send them, one nation to another, on missions of peace."

As we go forward, then, along this great highway into the future to a less troubled era I believe we can be resourceful enough to find the best possible methods to surmount any roadblocks which may be planted by those with axes to grind. I have in mind, for instance, the fact that the American Educational Theater Association already has a committee for U.S. touring by foreign university dramatic groups. I understand that this committee is at work seeking private engagements in the United States for educational groups from other countries, and it should have—if it is to really accomplish its great objectives—both status and public funds comparable to the program the American National Theater and Academy carries on for the Department of State.

A word about the little matter of the double expense in presenting performances of professional foreign artists in our country because of union policy that American artists must be paid during such a performance even though these American artists are not performing in the attraction. Here a bit of statesmanship is required on the part of top State Department officials. My, my, if they can't develop a policy to surmount such a roadblock, how can they possibly negotiate successfully with other nations.

My own suggestion, for what it is worth is as follows: If there are to be standbys, then why not react to this situation by providing, under the President's cultural exchange program, that such matching funds be utilized in a way similar to the funds of the music performance trust fund which is managed by representatives of the American Federation of Musicians, AFL–CIO, the broadcasting industry, and the public. Standby funds could and should be used to provide increased employment of American artists and, at the same time, cultural attractions could be offered under the fund's auspices throughout the United States. Cooperative arrangements could undoubtedly be worked out by the Department of State, with the blessing of the Congress, between the theater and music industry, the Federal Government, and such powerful unions as Actors' Equity Association, the Associated Actors and Artistes of America, AFL–CIO, the American Guild of Musical Artists, and the American Federation of Musicians, or whatever the unions involved. All it takes is good will on both sides and I know this is present.

In my opinion, if we are to capture the imagination and the minds and hearts of the peoples of the free world as well as the millions of uncommitted peoples—the United States must more definitively supply the energy, the resourcefulness, the creative power and talent which is ours to give than it has done so far. If this is to take place then several steps must be taken by the American Educational Theater Association in cooperation with other national educational organizations concerned with the arts in education. You must work together toward—

1. The establishment of a permanent division at the State Department in the Bureau of International Cultural Relations to handle the massive exchanges in the arts which must be developed as a central and integral part of this massive exchange program which President Eisenhower has called for. Such a permanent division must be headed by a distinguished educator, and must be staffed by leaders drawn from the arts departments of our colleges and universities. At the same time, the Advisory Committee on the Arts established by the Humphrey-Thompson Act (Public Law 860, 84th Cong.) must be reorganized and strengthened with the addition of leading educators from our college and university art departments. For several years now, every time the White House appointed people to an art commission in Washington, the District of Columbia Auditorium Commission, and the Advisory Committee on the Arts at the State Department are examples, the names of George Murphy and Robert Montgomery—from Hollywood via the Republican National Committee turned up. The names conspicuous for their absence, even from the Advisory Committee on the Arts of the National Cultural Center were those of Dr. Howard Hanson, director of the Eastman School of Music, and president of the National Music Council, other officials of the National Music Council, and distiguished art educators generally. At the present time the official directly in charge of the President's cultural exchange program at the Department of State is Mr. James Magdanz who has no background at all in the arts. He is a former budget officer, and no doubt a good budget officer. However, many of the present limitations of this vital program, for instance, its virtual exclusion of educational talent, is directly due to an astounding lack of familiarity with today's significant fine arts programs in our Nations' colleges and universities on the part of leading State Department officials. (H.R. 6876, THOMPSON; H.R. 7533, MCDOWELL; and S. 1827, HUMPHREY, go to the heart of the problem sketched here.)

2. The status and quality of our cultural affairs officers abroad must be sharply raised, and legislation will be offered soon to do this.

3. The establishment of a worldwide Olympiad of the Arts and Sciences and a national showcase program in our Nation's Capital has been developed by Representative MCDOWELL and will be introduced early in January 1960 by several sponsors in both Houses.

4. The establishment of a Federal Advisory Council on the Arts in the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. Sponsors include Senators HUBERT H. HUMPHREY; PAUL H. DOUGLAS; and JAMES E. MURRAY; and Representatives EMANUEL CELLER; JOHN V. LINDSAY; JAMES G. FULTON; SEYMOUR HALPERN; STUYVESANT WAINWRIGHT; LEE METCALF; CARROLL D. KEARNS; EDITH GREEN; DOMINICK V. DANIELS; ROBERT N. GIAIMO; CARL ELLIOTT, committee chairman; and JOHN A. LAFORE, JR., and FRANK THOMPSON, JR.

5. The establishment of the position of Special Assistant to the Secretary of State for the Coordination of International Educational and Cultural Relations has passed the Senate under the sponsorship of Senators J. WILLIAM FULBRIGHT and HUBERT H. HUMPHREY. House sponsors include Representatives WAYNE L. HAYS, STUYVESANT WAINWRIGHT, JOHN V. LINDSAY, JAMES G. FULTON, and FRANK THOMPSON, JR.

6. If the American National Theater and Academy is to continue in the future to enjoy its special privileged status as sole professional manager of the State Department's cultural exchange program with other nations then ANTA's reorganization must be sought. As you know, ANTA was chartered by the Congress in 1935 as a theater organization and it is undoubtedly rendering as great a service to the American theater and to American drama as the National Music Council—likewise chartered by the Congress—is rendering to American music.

When the State Department selected ANTA in 1954 for the important role of professional manager of the President's cultural exchange program which was authorized by the Congress in July of that year, ANTA set about creating advisory panels in music, the dance, and so on and more recently has established academic screening committees to advise it on outstanding talent in our colleges and universities in the performing arts. These latter committees are: The overseas touring committee of the American Educational Theater Association, and the academic screening committee of the music panel. After 5 years the time has come, I am convinced, to expect ANTA, in fairness and justice to the other art fields, to elevate these advisory panels and academic screening committees to a position where they are an integral part of ANTA itself, and in full charge of their respective fields of interest in the arts. These panels and committees should, at the same time, be broadened to provide the American Educational Theater Association, the National Music Council, the Music Educators National Conference, and the National Association of Schools of Music and other similar groups a more significant role in keeping with their importance in our society. ANTA would be a true arts council.

Alternatively, the American Educational Theater Association and the National Council of the Arts in Education should be contracted with directly by the State Department to manage our developing program of educational exchanges in the arts of the theater. For ANTA to continue to manage our cultural exchange program for the State Department without such significant internal changes would be comparable to the Department of Defense contracting with General Motors to manage its entire procurement program covering everything from submarines and airplanes to tanks and trucks. You can well imagine what giant aircraft companies like Douglas and Boeing and great automobile manufacturing companies like Ford and Chrysler would think of this. If it became known that the Defense Department was even considering establishing the kind of arrangement the State Department has with ANTA the outcry occasioned by Defense Secretary Wilson's remark that "What is good for General Motors is good for the country" would seem like a lark by comparison.

There are other areas directly relating to the arts fields which I want to discuss with you also—and briefly because of the time limitation. For several years I have urged that the status of our cultural affairs officers be raised and given a status equal to that of cultural affairs officers of other nations. I have introduced legislation to effect this change. We must create a career foreign service system in the U.S. Information Agency equal to that in the Department of State—of which it was originally an integral part to insure the ability to recruit high caliber people. Abbott Washburn, Deputy Director of the U.S. Information Agency, recently urged the need for legislation to correct the present deplorable situation. He pointed out that—

"The system under which we continue to operate is unsatisfactory for a number of reasons. Americans in our overseas service may hold appointments only as Foreign Service Reserve or Foreign Service Staff officers. Chiefly because of the lower ceiling on staff salaries, the Agency's most important and valuable officers—our public affairs officers and other top officials overseas—hold appointments as Foreign Service Reserve officers which in no sense meets our needs for a career service system. Reserve appointments are authorized under the Foreign Service Act for temporary service not to exceed 5 years. While Reserve officers are accorded the same salary and allowances as Foreign Service officers, the limitations on tenure make the Reserve category an antithesis of a career service. In addition, Reserve officers have no job security. Under the law, they may be separated at any time for any reason.

"As you know, many of our posts are located in areas where work is demanding and living is hard. Moreover, the work, itself, whatever the location, requires experience, expert knowledge, and a high level of ability and character."

Cultural affairs officers are, indeed, key men in the long-range program of presenting America's cultural image to the world. They surely deserve to be recognized as permanent career officers. I intend to continue to push for legislation which would accomplish this necessary change.

When the Congress convenes I am very hopeful, too, that we will act quickly to establish a Federal Advisory Council on the Arts. In my opinion this would represent a significant cultural step forward on the part of the Federal Government. A Federal Advisory Council on the Arts would formally recognize the essential role of the Government in promoting the arts. "There should be a Federal advisory agency as provided in several bills now pending before Congress," a resolution adopted by the Democratic Advisory Council on December 7, 1959, says, "with general authority to assist in formulating plans to develop the cultural resources of the United States, and to promote general appreciation of the beauty and educational value of works of art, literary and musical compositions and of the contribution of performing artists in all fields."

It is interesting and significant, I think, from a long-range point of view, in our Nation's cultural development that the bills in the Congress to establish a Federal Advisory Council on the Arts, and to carry out much of the legislative program I have outlined in my remarks today, now have the support of strong elements in the Democratic Party at the national level. The Young Democratic Clubs of America at their Toledo, Ohio, national convention in November 1959, and the Democratic Advisory Council at its New York City meeting on December 7, 1959, endorsed the bills in the Congress in support of the fine arts.

It will be interesting and important to observe if the organizations of the Republican Party follow suit, with regard to the fine arts legislation in the Congress—much of which has been sponsored by individual members of the Republican Party—including the bill for a Federal Advisory Council on the Arts which President Eisenhower first recommended to the Congress in his message on the state of the Union in 1955. The fine arts must have bipartisan support, just as our foreign policy does. Unfortunately, the Republican Party has tended to regard the arts in a more personal light as a handmaiden of political advantage. I need only remind you that the Committee of the Arts and Sciences for Eisenhower (CASE) established in the fall of 1956 had as its purpose, not the advancement of the fine arts, but the election of a leading official of the Republican Party. Such a committee can only discount the great purpose which the fine arts have in any democratic society. Certainly Thomas Jefferson and the other Founding Fathers never conceived of the arts in this particular context.

We in the Congress would deeply appreciate hearing much more than we do at present from the cultural leaders of our States and districts just as we presently hear from representatives of labor, agriculture, commerce, and industry. How many of you have contacted those sponsors of fine arts legislation in the Congress to tell them you appreciated their introduction of fine arts bills in the Congress? I'll wager not many, yet this is an essential part of the democratic process.

The need for greater understanding and support of the cultural activities of the Federal Government must be developed at the grassroots level, and must be given wider publicity. I would hope that the American Educational Theater Association will, as a part of its work here in its annual convention, adopt strong resolutions in support of some of the matters which I have discussed with you today in order that we as a nation may move forward in 1960 along the hard and difficult road to artistic and cultural maturity.

More of our citizens must come to know about the forthcoming $60 million fund drive for the National Cultural Center and the exciting plans of Architect Edward D. Stone for it which are now sorely threatened by a road-and-bridge complex developed by the Republican-controlled city government of the District of Columbia which doesn't have to account to the voteless citizens of Washington for its actions and which has had no firm direction from President Eisenhower who appointed its members. There is the added riddle of what the National Cultural Center will do about the educational fine arts. Despite the law which specifically lists the educational fine arts, including even the children's theater, there is little evidence that the present movers and shapers of the National Cultural Center have any plans for educational theater. Few of the country's leaders in educational drama and music have been appointed to positions of influence, and few men of wealth have been appointed to the board of trustees. We can only hope for the best, but the American Educational Theater Association should certainly call for appointments of leaders from the fields of the educational fine arts to the Advisory Committee on the Arts of the National Cultural Center, and condemn by an outright resolution the present plans for a bridge-and-road complex which the Commission of Fine Arts has found unacceptable.

I would like to say a word about the 45-room hospitality mansion which the American Council on Education, with which the American Educational Theater Association is affiliated, has purchased with Ford Foundation Funds ($500,000). The AETA is a real grassroots group and the Nation's most representative and powerful theater group. Certainly the AETA should have a special position at the new headquarters of the American Council on Education commensurate with its special and deserved position in our country's cultural life. In the past there has been no adequate headquarters for the reception of such special groups as were intent on learning about America firsthand, such as professors, students, correspondents, and others from nations across the face of the earth. Certainly in such an exciting program the American Educational Theater Association must and should have a role equal to that of the recently formed Institute of Contemporary Arts which is local and confined to the District of Columbia in its operations.

In closing, let me say that we must turn the spotlight on the arts by dramatizing across the Nation, through all the various media of communication, the exciting possibilities of our cultural resources. The stage is set for action, the players are on hand—only your direction will assure effective performances. The times in which we live demand that democracy's show must go on.

Address by Hon. Harry Flood Byrd, of Virginia, Before the American Farm Bureau Federation

OF
HON. HARRY FLOOD BYRD
OF VIRGINIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, January 13, 1960

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a speech I made before a meeting of the American Farm Bureau Federation in Chicago on December 15, 1959.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I am honored to be among those on the program of this 1959 meeting of the American Farm Bureau Federation. It is always a pleasure for me to participate in Farm Bureau meetings.

I take pride in being a conservative. Sometimes I am called old fashioned; but this is not the worst thing I have been called over a period of 50 years in public life. Let me tell you some of the things I believe.

I believe sound progress should be a primary purpose in every man's life. Sound progress is a source of strength. But progress is not sound unless it is based on sound financing; this is another application of the theory of checks and balances which has been so useful in our form of government.

Our form of government is the greatest and most productive the world has ever known. The fundamentals on which it was founded must be preserved. I have always fought wherever they were being attacked. They guarantee our freedoms and nourish our free enterprise system under which it is possible for every American to start at the bottom and work to the top.

I believe it is the individual initiative and national strength developed under our system that have brought this Nation to world leadership in relatively few generations. Historically, lives of nations are measured in hundreds—even thousands—of years. I want ours to be the longest and best.

I believe our form of government, our system and our freedoms can and would be destroyed by continuing centralization of government. Excessive centralization of government will inevitably lead to excessive Federal regulation, competition and taxation. In short, it will lead to State socialism.

I believe our people want our system perpetuated and strengthened. Basically the requirements are simply honesty and individual initiative, independent attitude and hard work, constructive production and free competition, and progressive development with sound financing. How well are we measuring up?

This Nation is showing signs of weakness when it should be strongest. Our form of government is being challenged from abroad and undermined at home. I pray none of us will live to see the fall of our great free enterprise system; but our freedoms are already being weakened.

We are in serious need of character and fortitude to restore, develop, and defend the sources of national strength which raised this country to world leadership. I urge your attention to these conditions today because we are in an historic turning point in world history.

We are entering a new era of atomic energy, rocketry, space, etc. Our population is increasing. Our resources are great. Our productive know-how and capacity are yet unsurpassed. Representative democracy with free enterprise should thrive soundly on these elements for the good of all mankind.

I firmly believe that with responsible citizenship, good government, and fiscal soundness there could be no fear for the future. Wihout these there can be neither solid progress nor security with military preparedness. These are simple requirements. But we are showing weakness at many points.

Our strength has been sapped by paternalism in Federal bureaucracy grown too big, usurpation of power by the Federal Supreme Court grown too mighty, and force of labor leaders grown too arrogant. These have undermined our system, changed our attitudes, and hobbled our will for freedom.

We are faced today with more deficits, more debt, growing inflation, sinking foreign trade balance, dwindling gold reserves, Russian gains in the continuing race in scientific, military and economic fields. These are serious weaknesses. They are dangerous conditions which must be reversed.

Federal deficit financing has been the rule for more than a quarter of a century. But the fiscal situation in the United States Government deteriorated faster in fiscal years 1958–59 than in any comparable peacetime period during my 26 years in the Senate.

In the short span of 6 months we moved from estimates of virtually balanced budgets to combined deficits of $15.4 billion. In the same period we were forced to raise the statutory limit on the Federal debt twice. In fact, it has now been raised the third time in 2 years.

During the past fiscal year Federal debt passed the World War II peak, and Federal spending and deficit financing reached levels exceeded only in years of all-out global war emergency. There will be more debt and deficit this fiscal year. Budget Director Maurice Stans sees rising expenditures in the future.

Today, December 15, 1959, the Federal debt is at its all-time peak in the history of this Republic. The debt is now $292½ billion and it is expected to be a billion dollars higher this time next month. There are no plans to begin paying off this astronomical debt.

As of this date, I foresee another deficit this fiscal year of $1 to 2 billion. A $95 million surplus is the official estimate. But the spending estimate is too low and the revenue estimate is too high. Spending up to $80 billion and revenue not exceeding $78 billion would not be surprising.

Deficit financing is a heavy factor in continuing inflation. Purchasing power of the dollar has dropped an average of a tenth of a cent a month for the past 7 months. It is down to 47.3 cents on the 1939 index. Think of this in terms of insurance you bought 20 years ago for protection of your family. And all indications point to continued cheapening of our currency.

Interest on the Federal debt this year will cost $9.1 billion. This figure should stick in the mind of every taxpaying citizen of this Nation, especially farmers. The Department of Agriculture is now estimating the combined net income of all farm operators in the United States this year at $9.6 billion.

Not only does interest on the Federal debt nearly equal net income of farm operators, but it approximates total annual Federal, State and local highway expenditures, and it is equivalent to far more than half of all State and local expenditures for public school education.

Interest on the Federal debt is averaging about 3 percent. New issues of recent months are costing nearly 5 percent. Should the whole debt of nearly $300 billion ever be refinanced at the new rates the interest cost would be upward of $15 billion, compared with $9.1 billion now—an increase of $5 to $6 billion, or more than 50 percent.

The terrible burden of this terrific debt is the result of 24 deficits in the past 29 years. Half of these deficits were incurred during years when we were fighting neither war nor depression. There have been four deficits totaling $23 billion since the Korean war was stopped. And the end is not in sight.

There was reason to expect runaway new Federal spending authorizations during the past year. This is where the Farm Bureau Federation stepped in so effectively to help sustain the President in his efforts to reduce spending by vetoes. Only one veto was overridden. I urged the Presidential vetoes; more will be needed in the coming year.

The total cost of Federal Government in the United States has gone up nearly $16 billion since the Korean war. This is a tremendous increase. It is 23 percent; it amounts to nearly $100 per capita; more than a billion and a quarter dollars a month; more than $43 million a day.

It may surprise you to know that the great increases in this period were not for military and foreign aid. They were in domestic-civilian programs and these too frequently involve multiyear or permanent commitments for heavy spending in the future. Increases in these programs are continuing.

But in the past 6 years domestic-civilian program spending increased nearly 83 percent to $34.9 billion; housing, highways, and commerce from less than $1 billion to nearly $7 billion; agriculture from $2.6 billion to more than $6 billion; labor and public welfare nearly doubled to $4.4 billion.

Much of this domestic-civilian spending is for subsidies through all kinds of Federal loans, grants, and payments. These not only increase Federal spending; they contribute to inflation. Inflation is destructive of fixed incomes, provident investment, prudent business, sound financing, national security, and free enterprise.

Nearly 40 million people will receive payments from the Federal Treasury this year totaling some $40 billion, including social security. With their families these 40 million people could easily reach a number equivalent to half our population. In this connection, there are now 90 Federal programs for subsidy payments to States, localities, individuals, etc., totaling more than $9.5 billion a year.

In addition to increasing direct expenditures and debt, the Federal Government has underwritten nearly $275 billion in contingent liabilities in the form of insured and guaranteed loans, insurance in force, etc. This is an increase of $70 billion in contingent liabilities assumed since the Korean war.

The Federal Government is now subsidizing business, industry, private finance, agriculture, transportation, power, housing, health, education, States, localities, and individuals, etc. And when they take their subsidies they give up independence and freedom. They submit to bureaucratic control.

And where does this money come from? Taxes are the Government's only source of revenue. To borrow the money simply takes more taxes. And wherever there is debt—public or private—cold terms of mortgage are grim reality. How can we disregard this?

Subsidies and inflation feed on each other, and both of them feed paternalism. Paternalism centralizes power in Washington bureaucracy. By the process of cheapening our money and centralizing power we have descended to a level of state socialism which is obvious if not admitted.

Social democracy undermines sound government and stifles constructive enterprise. Its evils have been proved wherever nations have stooped to it. We know these things, but responsible citizenship in this country today seems insufficient to hold back the growing demand for more.

Irresponsible attitudes with respect to Federal spending are bad enough, but they are epidemic. They have spread to State and local governments. They have permeated the whole economy and society. They are evident in both public and private pursuit. Take our great highway programs for example.

Perhaps more than any other group, farmers have reason to be interested in good roads and highways. Few people have worked longer and harder for them than I have. In Virginia we are proud of our 52,000 miles of State highway systems—all developed on a pay-as-you-go basis.

I think there should be an interstate highway system. I appreciate traffic problems in urban areas. But like you, I know the basic requirements for farm-to-market roads, and I think all who benefit from them—at both ends—should think twice before they do anything to impede their continuing development.

I am certain essential requirements of both the regular Federal-aid primary and secondary roads, generally referred to as the ABC system, and the Interstate System can be met in an orderly way on a pay-as-you-go basis without excessive taxes. This was the purpose of the so-called Byrd amendment in the Federal Highway Act of 1956.

Under that act Federal gas taxes and revenue from other highway sources were segregated into a trust fund for use in construction on both the regular Federal-aid roads and the Interstate System. The Byrd amendment put the whole Federal program on a firm basis by writing the pay-as-you-go policy into the law.

As you know, the time-proved ABC system roads are constructed with funds matched equally, on a 50–50 basis, by the State and Federal Governments, and the States retain dominant control. But it is generally understood that interstate roads are built with 90 percent Federal money and 10 percent State funds.

Under such a Federal formula it is easy to see how interstate projects may be very enticing. But like so many other Federal programs, this one, too, needs further examination. And if it is not watched closely and controlled carefully, it can result in more harm than good in highway development.

Take a look at the experience to date. We superimposed this Interstate System over our well-tested ABC system, and the weaknesses and temptations came quickly to light. The estimated cost of the system has gone up 73 percent since its inception, and on present schedule the program still has 15 years to go.

At best these are extremely expensive roads. It is not difficult to find interstate projects where 10 percent of the cost exceeds 50 percent of the cost of equally important ABC projects. And once interstate roads are built the States forever assume 100 percent of their high-cost maintenance.

Furthermore, the interstate highways are almost invariably limited access roads. In many areas the States must construct paralleling roads to get traffic on them, off of them, and on the other side of them. This places another heavy burden on State highway funds.

In short, it is easy to see how 90–10 Federal highway money may tempt States to divert their funds from ABC roads of higher priority to interstate projects. And once Interstate System roads are built they eat up State funds in expensive maintenance and construction duplication.

With its high ratio of expenditures on interstate roads, the Federal Government is now spending twice as much as the States on highway construction—$3 billion to $1.5 billion. In this situation, as you can imagine, the Federal Government has begun dominating the programs.

Excited by the temporary recession in 1958, Congress abandoned the Federal pay-as-you-go provision by repealing the Byrd amendment and went on a spending spree. Our great highway programs were thrown into an inexcusable mess. State programs were seriously disrupted and threatened with chaos. The trust fund was broke. The integrity of the Federal Government was impaired when the cost of contracts awarded exceeded funds available.

We were forced to raise Federal gas taxes. But we managed to make the increase temporary and reinstate the Byrd pay-as-you-go amendment. But I can tell you there is need for vigilance if we are to avoid making the gas tax increase permanent and raiding general fund revenue for the Federal Interstate Highways.

You know the importance of both systems. Your position for sound financing is traditional. Farm bureaus all over the Nation have intimate knowledge of highway requirements. The federation can be of great constructive service in keeping these programs in proper balance and within our ability to pay for them.

Raising Federal gas taxes is an example of how, in the process of centralizing power, the Federal Government usurps State and local revenue sources at the same time it encourages greater expenditures at all levels. Like the Federal Government, States, and localities are now finding it difficult to pay their bills.

Both are trying to push more of their costs on the Federal Government—States sacrificing their sovereignty and localities their autonomy. Taxpayers, pinched by levies at all levels, look for tax loopholes and avoidance at the expense of their self-respect.

We have increased total debt in the United States nearly $200 billion in 5 years. Most of this increase is private. The American people now have nearly a trillion dollars in debt on their backs; more than $350 billion in public debt, and more than $550 billion in private debt.

When individuals become insolvent they take bankruptcy and dispose of their obligations. When governments become insolvent their money becomes worthless and they go through a revolution wringer. The nature of the revolutions may vary, but change in the form of government in inevitable.

I do not imply that this Nation or the Government is insolvent. But make no mistakes. Profligate spending has strained our fiscal position. And in this condition we are vulnerable to insidious attacks on the fundamentals of our form of government.

Ours is a government originating in the sovereignty of the States. Under our Constitution the States gave certain powers to the Federal Government and kept the rest. And constitutionally the Federal Government is in the form of three separate branches—they are coordinate, but each is independent of the other.

The checks and balances in this system are obvious. Their purpose is to protect the fundamentals on which our form of government and our enterprise system are based and the freedoms they require. And we had better start defending against those who would destroy the things which have made this Nation great.

In our present condition and state of mind, the Warren Supreme Court has usurped legislative powers and executive authority, struck at State sovereignty, deprived citizens of traditional freedoms, and set free those convicted of Communist subversion.

By destructive decree and naked force the Warren Court has violated our fundamentals, undermined our institutions, and invaded our privacy. Its decisions are called "law of the land." Our Constitution empowers only Congress to make Federal law; and there is reason for this. Members of Congress are elected by the people and are answerable to them.

Without the great strength developed in this Nation in earlier days, it would be difficult to survive this latter-day Federal bureaucracy and judiciary. Federal usurpation, combined with abuses by irresponsible labor leaders, curtail sound progress, and insidiously sap national strength.

I am glad to learn Senator JOHN MCCLELLAN will be among the speakers at this meeting. No one has done more to reveal corruption at high union levels and misuse of power by arrogant labor leaders. This takes courage, and JOHN MCCLELLAN has got it. He has contributed great service to his country.

Senator MCCLELLAN has a fine legal background. He has keen insight. He has studied labor legislation. His advice to you on this subject will be the best. And if the steel strike is not settled when the injunction expires next month, demand for more legislation is certain to come soon.

When he speaks tomorrow I hope he will tell you how Harry Bridges, the Communist Longshoreman's boss, and Jimmy Hoffa, the Teamsters' boss, planned a worldwide boycott. That plan demonstrates the power and danger in present labor leadership. He told me 232 witnesses "took the fifth amendment" in hearings before his labor rackets subcommittee.

You heard and saw those witnesses before the committee. Did you imagine so many thugs, gangsters, and racketeers were out of jail? "Taking the fifth," their silence was indisputable evidence of weakness in our national fiber. We all know they should be restrained from the practices to which they were witness.

You have shown your knowledge of this weakness. I supported all labor legislation the federation recommended in the past session. I am the only member now in the Senate who voted against the Wagner Labor Act in 1939. This act gave special privileges to labor unions. I voted for the Taft-Hartley Act and against the Truman veto. I supported the strong labor bill last session. I would vote for a stronger bill now.

I have always conceded to the good citizens in the rank and file of labor unions the privilege of organizing. I was among the first to concede to legitimate labor unions the privilege of collective bargaining when they are bona fide representatives of their membership.

But when irresponsible labor leaders have the power virtually to shut down the country, our national security is imperiled; when they have the power to stop production and wages, our economy is impaired; when they have the power to force wage increases unjustified by increased production, they create inflation.

We hear a lot about issues in strikes today. Usually there are only two. One is an inflationary wage increase unjustified by increased production. The other is more authority to tell management how to run the business. More power for the labor leaders usually is the big objective, with little regard for others.

I am sure you have noted the dangerous competition among today's labor leaders. When one gains in a strike, the others think they must do better. If McDonald wins in steel, Reuther will think he must strike the automobile industry for more, and so on it will continue.

Not only can irresponsible labor leaders choke off vital production in critical periods; they can ruthlessly control the livelihood of millions of people. The costly steel strike ran 116 days before it was stopped by court order. Who can measure the price to be paid either by steel worker families or the Nation?

That strike alone stopped production for nearly 4 months by a half-million workers employed in steel plants. Work stopped for thousands more in dependent industries. At the same time lesser strikes stopped work for tens of thousands more in the butcher, mine, mill, smelter, glass, shipyard and other industries.

More than 60 million man-days of labor have been lost this year as a direct result of strikes. Strikes almost invariably increase production costs. We feel some of the undue production costs directly, but much of the damage is hidden. For instance, our products must compete in foreign trade markets.

This is a matter of great importance at this time. The comparative level of our imports affects our balance of payments with other countries. We are in balance-of-payments difficulty now. Serious imbalance siphons out our gold. This, among other things, involves the value of our money.

The level of imports is not the only factor in the problem; others include dollars spent out of the country by our far-flung military operations; we are still dumping billions abroad in foreign aid programs, etc. But it would help the situation if our prices were more competitive.

The Secretary of the U.S. Treasury appeared before the International Monetary Fund asking that certain nations stop discriminatory trade practices against us. I know this action would not have been taken unnecessarily.

In 10 years we have purchased abroad, invested abroad, and given away abroad 17 billion in gold and liquid dollars more than we have earned from foreign nations through exports of goods and services. This deficit in the current year is running at the rate of $4 billion. Last year it was $3.4 billion.

Such deficits cannot continue indefinitely. Foreign countries are now holding more than 17 billion in liquid dollars. More than half of this is in official accounts, and the governments holding these dollars can call upon us to convert them into gold if they wish. They will do this if the dollar is not kept strong.

There is need to protect our gold reserves. In this situation you can see there are reasons for balanced budgets and reduction in debt that do not readily meet the eye. Keeping our currency sound, and protecting its purchasing power at home, is a major factor in preserving free world confidence in the U.S. dollar.

The Secretary of the Treasury needs backing at home. He needs the cooperation of the Government, labor unions, and business—by all of us, including farmers. Failure to adjust our balance of payments will be a continuing threat to our gold reserves.

The Government should balance its budget, reduce its debt and stop inflation. It can start by reducing foreign aid expenditures. Over the last 14 years we have dumped $75 billion of foreign assistance into 85 countries. And many of these have become our serious competitors in world markets.

Labor leaders have great responsibility for rising prices and inflation. Industry has its responsibilities in this matter, too. The fact is that many of our products have been priced out of foreign trade.

Agricultural products have been about 22 percent of our total merchandise exports during the past 10 years. Actually, this is a somewhat smaller percentage than it was before World War II; and about one-third of the farm exports are now being sold for "soft" currencies abroad under Public Law 480 programs and section 402 of the Mutual Security Act.

Most of our payments abroad are in dollars, many of which accumulate in foreign reserves. But farm exports sold for soft local currencies, bartered or given away do not earn for the United States either gold or dollars. This type of export is of little help in efforts to correct our balance of payments deficit. We know the Public Law 480 program has been exploited for use not intended. Perhaps it could be constructively reviewed.

I know the Farm Bureau Federation wants to make our agricultural products more competitive in world markets, and less dependent upon Government at home. I hope you will redouble your efforts to bring about that highly desirable condition. You can count on my enthusiastic support.

Our tolerance of increasing Federal paternalism and spending, increasing usurpation of power by the Supreme Court, and increasing arrogance by labor leaders is a clear sign of national weakness developing among us. These are three menacing subversions of our system which must be brought under control.

Our complacency about such fundamental matters is amazing. In contrast, last year when a recession cloud appeared on the horizon, Congress was deluged with spending demands that made the Nation appear hysterical—approaching panic. Our idol seems to be a fast buck; not a golden calf.

In my opinion too much Federal control and spending are at the base of most of our trouble. Easy money through Federal paternalism, and an economy continually doped up with inflation will never produce national strength. They are destructive of character and initiative.

We shall be moving for national strength when we demand—and get—elimination of paternalistic programs and deficit financing, reduction in debt, halt in inflation, and sympathetic allegiance to fundamentals throughout the Nation, including the Federal Government and the judiciary.

We shall be moving for strength of character and constructive initiative when we stop requesting nonessential new programs and expenditures; when we revitalize our State and local governments; and when we assert the fundamental freedoms and independence which are our heritage.

When these things are done we shall merit our position of leadership in the free world. Unless and until they are done we shall be working for the Communist objective publicly declared in Moscow last May Day when the Russians said their primary purpose is to outgain capitalism in minimum time.

We have to admit they are achieving impressive gains in many fields. Their gains have made our weaknesses clearer and more ominous. We know what our weaknesses are. We know where they are. We know in our conscience what should be done. We know in our minds what must be done.

The American Farm Bureau Federation has taken the lead before in proving the judgment of our people is basically sound and can be made to prevail. I urge you to renew your efforts now for the good of our country at the grassroots and in high places.

Among other things which must be done, I think the American Farm Bureau Federation can render especially effective leadership in:

1. Stopping expenditures in excess of our income by eliminating nonessential spending;

2. Reducing the Federal debt; this would be a great deterrent to inflation for the present and lift some of the burden we are loading on generations of the future.

3. Watching and controlling the Federal highway programs, to keep the Interstate System from running wild at the expense of farm-to-market and other important State roads;

4. Conducting a constructive review of the Public Law 480 farm product export program; and

5. Curbing the excesses indulged in by labor leaders, without destroying the right of collective bargaining.

I shall be with you all the way to the fullest extent of my capacity and energy.

Address of Hon. Joseph W. Martin, Jr.

OF

HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 13, 1960

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an address by the Honorable JOSEPH W. MARTIN, JR., of Massachusetts, at the annual dinner of the New England Society in the city of New York, on Thursday, December 3, 1959.

In his speech, Mr. MARTIN related the fine progress of the New England States in the new industrial age. He also discussed the menace of inflation and the need for action to prevent the destruction of the value of the dollar.

There is a message in this address which I consider extremely timely and of great importance to the American people. It is important from the viewpoint of the economic soundness of our country.

The address follows:

It is a great privilege to come to this fine gathering of people who, while now a vital part of the great Empire State, have not forgotten the part of the country to which they trace their origins.

This is the 154th annual dinner of your society. Its very age is conclusive evidence of the ties of affection which a New Englander always bears to the land of his origin. While I still live in the bustling town where I was born, I have traveled far, and whether it was in California, Hawaii, or even the Orient, people of New England origin never fail to grasp the chance to reminisce about the State of their birth and yearn to relive the old days.

One hundred and fifty-four years old. What mighty changes have come to New England, America—yes, to the world in this span of time. In the early days of this society, we were a struggling nation, a nation whose people were mostly loyal to some particular section, as your founders were to New England. Now while we are properly loyal to and cherish the State of our birth, our supreme loyalty is to the Nation itself. It is this love of country which has made us the mightiest Nation of all time. It is this loyalty that will make it possible for us to meet the challenge which will unfold in the future.

If there is any fault to be found with New Englanders, it is that we do not extol more vigorously our past contributions to the Nation, the contributions we are making today, and those we expect to make in the days ahead.

Texas never tires of telling of the wonderful achievements of that great State in the Southwest. Virginia takes just pride in its historic past and the great part it had in the formation of the Republic. California properly boasts of its tremendous growth and of its great future. New York likes to remind us of her eminence in trade, commerce, and banking. This is the spirit which makes it possible for us to look to the future with great expectancy.

We New Englanders have every reason to speak up about our contributions to the early history of our country, our busy present days, and the promise of the future. It is because that, as a people, we are of a modest nature many have come to believe we are slipping backward and that we are a declining section of a great nation.

This concept is far from the truth. New England is still forging ahead—a little slower perhaps than the newer sections, but still progressing at a healthy rate. We hope to accelerate that rate in the days ahead.

New England has been forced to redirect its course on several occasions. The early days were the maritime era. It was in New England where the American Navy was born and where it was stimulated in the critical days of the Republic. Our clipper ships sailed the seven seas, bringing the wealth and produce of the world to the new land. The beautiful homes of the old sea captains upon Cape Cod and the north shore still remind us of this great era.

Then started the industrial age. The Government nurtured the new industries with the tariff to protect our infant industries, and simultaneously there was a decline in shipping. Quick to adapt itself, New England turned to the factories for a livelihood.

The first cotton mill in America, the first iron foundry, and one of the first General Electric plants were just a few of the early contributions.

Those were the days of water power. It was not long before every river in New England was dotted with a little factory giving employment to hundreds of workers and prosperity to many little villages. Far removed from the sources of raw material, this progress was remarkable. These industries blazed the way for the great industrial empire of the United States.

In later days, new conditions arose. Many cotton mills went South to be close to the sources of raw material, to obtain cheaper labor and operating costs. Dominance in the cotton textile trade, for years a bulwark of New England economy, was no longer to be found here. This was a painful period of readjustment to many of our cities and towns. But happily that period has passed. We have come through this crisis with customary New England courage and determination, and we can now see brighter days ahead.

We have grasped the opportunities of the new age, the age of nuclear power, the age of electronics and plastics. The coming nuclear power will give New England a great advantage in the future, an advantage we have not had in the past. Today new factories are springing up everywhere. Wonderful modern plants are replacing the old factories. People are working at better wages than ever. I can tell you good people there is no gloom or despair in New England.

We face the future fully confident that the people of our section will measure up to their historic past.

How, I ask you, can we fail? Here in New England is the wealth, greater per capita than any other section. We have the brains and the industrial leadership to direct that wealth. And above all, we have great educational advantages and research centers in our many fine universities and colleges. Every year these schools are turning out the best-trained minds in the world to meet the industrial challenges of our times. We must continue to maintain and expand our great schools of learning. They are one of our greatest assets.

Years ago, when taunted in the Halls of Congress by a colleague with the inquiry: "What does New England produce?", Daniel Webster thundered back with his great voice—"New England, sir, produces men."

It is because we produce able men and women, the most skilled workers, the best-trained leaders that we go forward to further glorify your New England heritage.

We have many handicaps in New England, such as a hard soil to cultivate, and remoteness from the sections where raw materials are produced. But we do have distinct advantages. Within a radius of 500 miles is a market containing a population of 52 million consumers, the richest buying market in the world.

New England is the mecca of people from all parts of the Union who want to get away from the heat of other sections and enjoy the opportunities for a refreshing summer vacation under excellent climatic conditions. Every year the list of summer visitors grows, and Cape Cod is sometimes called the Florida of the summer season. It is unnecessary to mention the possibilities this provides to increase the earning opportunities of our section. Thousands are already profiting from the evergrowing tourist trade.

We do not forget the deeds of the Pilgrims and the Puritans who, along with the cavaliers of Virginia, built this great American heritage. It was built by hard work and loyalty to the State. We must not stray from these principles. They are still the foundation upon which the safety of our great Republic rests.

The Pilgrims in Plymouth taught us early that communism or socialism would not work in the New World. They briefly tried this system of regimentation, but it ended in failure. They were quick to cast aside the experiment and to substitute instead the system of profit for work accomplished. They knew that, if the new land was to flourish and grow, it must have the stimulus of individual opportunity and initiative.

The lesson is most timely today when a powerful nation asks the world to embrace the ideology of communism. The Pilgrims knew better and so must the people of today if they are to enjoy the blessings of progess, happiness, and human dignity that are available only when freedom prevails.

The Pilgrims knew, too, the value of a democratic government. They realized that free men and women are supposed to run the Government, and it should not be the function of government to manage the private lives of the people. Chaos and confusion generally result from too much government interference.

Today we are drifting away from those principles. I hope this trend will not go too far and that the people of New England will remain true to their traditions and sturdily resist the tendency toward a powerful bureaucracy which seeks to manage the details of our lives. This eventually would mean the loss of our liberties and finally the end of the American way of life.

To those who constantly seek Government aid for private projects, I might remind them that the Government in Washington has no secret source of revenue. It has only the money it takes from the people in taxes. When the Federal Government is given the assignment of spending your money, it levies a huge brokerage charge for doing so. Thus it can readily be seen you are paying more when you ask the Federal Government to pay for a project than if you did it yourselves.

The people of America have many grave, challenging problems today. We must solve them properly or risk the danger of a serious blight on our future. Above all is the need of preserving peace. Closely associated with the need of peace is the need of controlling the forces of inflation.

The curbing of inflation should be the grave concern of every American, regardless of economic status. But its ravages are felt especially by the poor. In fact, the lower an individual is on the economic ladder, the more he suffers from the effects of rising prices. For the poor, a sound and stable dollar makes the difference between a decent meal and hunger. That is why the achievement of a stable currency must be our goal.

The little people of our land—those owning modest insurance policies, savings accounts, Government bonds, and those old folks living on small pensions and social security—are rightly worried by the gradual whittling away of the value of money in the devastating course of "creeping inflation."

In a rising and expanding economy, the accomplishment of price stability becomes a difficult and a complex problem. It is economic history that, in periods of high and rising demand for goods and services, prices tend to go up. There is no easy solution to the problem, such as the passage of a law. The truth is that the most effective laws we can employ to combat the menace of inflation are the laws of commonsense.

The practice of reasonable self-restraint on the part of management, labor, and the general public is inherent in the success of this undertaking.

It would be a sad day for America to resort again to a system of Government controls. Such controls are destructive to competitive enterprise, and they are destructive to individual liberties. What is even worse, for the most part, they do not work.

A system of price controls would be unworkable without wage controls, profit controls, and the rationing of goods. This would mean the creation of another gigantic bureaucracy in Washington to run the Nation's business, when the bureaucracy is already too big. Moreover, controls lead to the inevitable black markets and the loss of freedom on which our prosperity has been built.

The problem we face, therefore, is to maintain a growing, expanding economy, providing jobs for our increasing population and at the same time to maintain a stable dollar. It is unthinkable that we should reconcile ourselves to a continuous vicious spiral of inflation where wages and prices chase each other ever-upward.

Dilution of the value of the dollar discourages people from saving. They see little incentive to save dollars which would steadily decline in value each year. Of course, under such conditions, the little people on pensions and fixed incomes find it impossible to save anyway. Declining savings would mean that capital to finance normal growth would become scarce, making it more costly to borrow money as interest rates go up. This could result in cutbacks in programs for business expansion and improvement; and that, of course, creates unemployment and recession.

For the past 20 years, the dollar has been declining in value as a result of the inflationary process. There have been variances from year to year in the rate of decline, but there has been no essential change in the pattern of decline. Thus, a dollar in the period from 1935 to 1939 was worth 48 and a fraction cents by the year 1958.

We have seen other nations go through the wringer of inflation. We have seen Germany, for instance, after World War I so debase its currency that it was literally necessary for a housewife to carry a wheelbarrow full of paper money to buy her groceries.

The experience of France furnishes further testimony of the havoc wrought by runaway inflation.

Typical is the story of the thrifty Frenchman who sold his house in Normandy and bought life annuities that at the time of purchase would have provided himself and his wife a minimum of security for their old age. That was in 1927. Thirty years later, the cost of living had gone up 37 times what it was in 1927. The pound of butter she could have bought for 10 francs in 1927 now costs her 410 francs. This tragic widow was reduced to buying one egg at a time, a little milk every other day, and a slice of ham once a week.

France has experienced the disastrous results of a paternalistic government which went too far toward socialization. The French have learned the bitter lesson that government cannot give its people anything it does not take away from them in the first place. The people rebelled against paying for their social reforms in taxes. So they are paying for them in the destruction of the value of their money. Here again, of course, it is easy to see that the poorest people are the hardest hit.

But we do not have to go beyond our own shores to realize the evils of inflation. The decline in the value of the American dollar graphically tells the story.

An American with an income of $3,000 a year in 1939 needed an income of $7,370 for exactly the same amount of purchasing power in 1957.

An individual who had an income of $5,000 a year in 1939 needed an income of $13,004 in 1957 to maintain the same standard of living.

If the same trends should continue from now until 1975, the person who had a $3,000 income in 1939 will need an income of $16,867 to live in the same manner as he did in 1939.

One does not have to be much of a prophet to see that, if the present trend continues unabated, this country is on a joyride to a disastrous crash. It must be prevented. It will be prevented if the people do a little serious thinking.

There are numerous reasons for this inflationary process, but the heart of the problem lies in Federal deficit spending and a mounting Federal debt.

In 22 of the last 27 years, the Federal Government has spent more money than it has taken in taxes.

What should be done to control the destructive forces which in 20 years have cut the value of the dollar in half and which threaten to diminish it still further?

The first sound approach to this problem is to discontinue this now accepted practice of deficit spending and to operate on balanced budgets in all years except years of national emergency.

One method of balancing our budgets would be to increase taxes. But this method should be rejected because taxes already absorb too great a proportion of the citizen's dollar.

Studies made by the Tax Foundation show that in an 8-hour day the average $4,500-a-year wage earner must work for the Government 2 hours and 29 minutes. This is more than he must work to pay his food bill, which is 1 hour and 39 minutes; or his housing, for which he must work 1 hour and 25 minutes; or for clothing, for which he must work 37 minutes. The average man already pays out one-third of his income in direct and hidden taxes. That is too high. Reduced taxes are vital to stimulate our economy.

The only other method of balancing the budget is to reduce Federal spending. And this is the sound and sensible approach. If this country is to wage a successful battle against ruinous inflation, it is obligatory on the part of the administration and the Congress to begin now a system of progressive reduction in our budgets each year.

We often hear it said that you cannot cut military spending—that to do so would endanger our national defense. I cannot subscribe to this belief. And the fact that military spending accounts for such a large part of the whole budget is often cited as an excuse for not reducing spending anywhere at all.

Spending for national defense should be scrutinized as carefully as any other forms of expenditures. Enormous savings can be made in the armed services without in any way impairing their essential strength and their defense potential. We need to give all that is necessary for the preservation of peace and our security, but not a cent more.

The responsibility for drastic cuts in spending is not the responsibility of the Congress alone. Far from it. Equal responsibility rests upon the administration and the executive departments. Too often the Appropriations Committees of the Congress are the innocent victims of inflated budget requests sent up to the Capitol by the executive branch. The administrative people, feeling their requests may be cut down, often overstate their needs in order to get what they want. This is wrong. Those who run the departments would render a real patriotic service and help to control inflation by putting their own houses in order and keeping their budget demands down to a minimum instead of a maximum which has grown to be a rather general practice.

There is not a single department, including the military, which could not run for substantially less money without impairment to any essential public service if there is the will and determination to do so.

The maintenance of peace and the need of cooperative relations with the other nations of the world demand our closest attention. Without peace no nation can expect to attain the progress its people pray for. With peace we can all expect an expanding economy, prosperity, and a better world for all.

The real guardianship of peace in the immediate years ahead will primarily rest with the United States. We are the one nation whose resources and strength make other nations pause before engaging in a war that would be disastrous.

It is because of that great responsibility we are spending over $40 billion for national defense. Your national administration would much prefer to use these funds to balance the budget, cut Federal taxes, and direct great sums to humane activities.

But as long as the threat of communism exists we must continue to spend huge amounts for missiles, aircraft, the Army, the Navy, and the Air Force. We must be so strong that our strength will guarantee peace. We spend these vast sums for peace and not for war.

It is the same story with our aid in the building up of the "have not" nations of the world. We help other nations build their military strength because we want them to be able to resist aggression and contribute to the defense of the free world.

We spend for economic aid so that other nations may live better, and we know that will contribute to our own prosperity through the purchase of goods that could not be bought otherwise.

We help the little nations of Asia, Africa, and South America because we know that if we do not the Communists may well do so.

We want them as friends and voluntarily on the side of the free world.

In the past we have been neglectful of South America. We have taken these countries too much for granted. The Communists, noticing that neglect, have not been slow to stir up strife through their insidious propaganda. Fortunately, the South American Republics know full well that they can expect no permanent good from the Soviet world. They want freedom; they want to build strong nations; and from our past history they know the United States is the one country that can and will help them. So it is incumbent upon us to invest a little money in building up South America. It will yield great dividends of good will and cooperation and, from a business point of view, will open tremendous markets for American goods.

Wisely administered, we can well make these foreign expenditures profitable to both the recipient of the aid and to our own country as well. South America knows, as indeed the whole world must know, that our country is not selfish in its aid. It seeks neither territory nor domination in any part of the world. It wants all nations and all people to be free, independent, and prosperous.

The future is full of hazards, and the picture is cloudy. But I believe we will meet these difficult problems at home and abroad with the courage and determination demonstrated by our New England forebears when this Nation was born. With courage we can meet the challenge given to us by the other nations of the free world.

We can and must avoid war, and we must make our dollar sound. If we do there will be a more abundant life not only for the people of America but for the other free nations of the world as well.

May the Almighty guide us in the great tasks which lie ahead.

Address by Hon. Jennings Randolph, of West Virginia, to Membership Dinner of Veterans of Foreign Wars, Post 629, Fairmont, W. Va.

HON. MIKE MANSFIELD

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, January 13, 1960

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, on behalf of the distinguished senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH], I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the text of an address delivered by him at the membership dinner of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, Post No. 629, Fairmont, W. Va., on January 10, 1960. The subject of the address is "The Obligations of Freedom."

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE OBLIGATIONS OF FREEDOM

(Address by Senator JENNINGS RANDOLPH, Democrat, of West Virginia, to the Veterans of Foreign Wars, Post No. 629, Membership Dinner, Fairmont, W. Va., January 10, 1960)

Commander Jack W. Bunner, officers and members of the Fairmont Post of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the topic which you have asked me to discuss is not only one of cold war implications. It is one which bears upon our hearts and minds and embraces the very nature of the meaning of freedom and the duties of free citizens to maintain it. But, as Dr. Karl Menninger said of the virtue of humility which disappears when one lays claim to it, freedom tends to disappear when it is confused with license.

The absolute and unabridged right to do as one pleases and to pursue personal pleasure and profit do not in themselves represent the liberty of men and women in a free society.

Freedom imposes its own obligations upon the citizen. The first of these is to understand the nature of freedom itself, the second to understand the nature of its opponents. Since each veteran here has contributed a portion of your life, and some have given blood in the defense of freedom, I know you have more than an average understanding of the cause of freedom. It has been suggested that I indicate ways in which such patriotic organizations as yours can best contribute to the common defense.

Let me devote a few words to defining the face of the evil with which we are confronted.

DIRECTOR OF FBI EXPLAINS GROWTH

One hundred years ago communism was a theory of history and economics coveted by a handful of men in Europe and England. Some 40 years ago, at the time of the Bolshevik revolution, communism commanded a small but militant force of some 80,000 followers. Today, it claims a total world membership of more than 33 million, with active party units located in 83 nations, according to J. Edgar Hoover, who has acted with courage and zeal in the uncovering of Communist schemes.

In addition, while the Soviet Union holds forth the olive branch of peaceful coexistence, international communism, aided by followers working within, has subjugated 17 countries with a population of over 900 million people or about one-third of those on this planet. While Khrushchev extends the hope of lessening world tensions, his Chinese partners are engaged in shipping contraband arms to North Africa, fomenting disturbances among their neighbors, and threatening the peace of Southeast Asia.

Though the capacity of the individual American citizen to affect the tide of events in these areas is limited, each of us can contribute by keeping ourselves informed on foreign affairs and by supporting the kind of military and economic aid programs which will strengthen our friends abroad.

But I interpose the declaration here that we have a double obligation to provide adequately for our domestic needs if we would keep our country strong.

The challenge on the domestic front, however, is one which can be accepted by each individual in his capacity as a citizen in a free society. And we must all make sure that our voices are heard and that our rights of suffrage are exercised.

As the primary target of worldwide communism, the United States is the chief objective of Soviet espionage. Again, according to FBI Director Hoover, Soviet defectors indicate that between 70 and 80 percent of Russian officials in the United States are members of the Red intelligence services. The importance which the Soviet Union attaches to the value of these agents is vividly pointed up by the sharp increase of Soviet diplomatic personnel in our country. In May 1954, there were 212 Russian officials in the United States; 5 years later, that number had increased to 313—or almost 50 percent.

SOVIET SEEKS TO SECURE SECRETS

Soviet espionage activities in this country expose their disregard for the doctrine of "peaceful coexistence." A 10-year "peace offensive" is but a brief episode within the "permanent revolution", as many of us believe. Just as this revolution continues unceasingly, so do the Communist espionage efforts in the United States. Using blackmail, bribery, and similar techniques, Soviet agents—many with diplomatic immunity—continue in their efforts to obtain our military, scientific and industrial secrets.

Aiding and abetting them is the Communist Party, U.S.A., an integral part of the international Communist conspiracy. It is composed of the disciples—the hard-core militants for the Soviet Union—who sing the praises of Communist Russia despite the dreadful inhumanity to man inflicted in much of the world by the Soviets and their satellites.

These are the people so blinded by their commitment to the false doctrines of communism and so indoctrinated in their hatred of the United States that they still give their allegiance to the Communist Party despite the Soviet brutalities in Hungary, the herding of countless millions of Chinese into the degradation of the communes and the rape of Tibet.

Within the United States there are certain groups which—because of the roles assigned them by the science of Marxism-Leninism—are targets for infiltration and indoctrination by the Communist Party. Five of these groups are of prime importance.

The first group is the working class, through which, according to Marxist ideology, capitalism prepares its own doom. During the 1920's the party's efforts in this field were spearheaded by the Trade Union Educational League. But in 1935, in accordance with a new party line of the united front, boring from within became the order.

And from 1935, when the CIO became the chief target, to 1949, when the Communist-dominated unions were expelled, the party was astonishingly effective in making its inroads. In a factual and carefully written book by Max M. Kampelman, "The Communist Party Versus the CIO," is this passage: "Assuming that of this number (70,000—the largest number of Communist Party members in recent years) one-half belong to the unions, * * * they would have had a maximum numerical strength of twenty-four ten-thousandths of the 15 million labor union members. Yet at the height of this power drive within the CIO, they dominated 12 to 15 of the 40 international CIO unions."

LOYAL LABOR UNIONS OPPOSE COMMUNISM

The final victory of the millions of loyal union members under the inspired and courageous leadership of such men as Philip Murray and Walter Reuther is now the source of much well-won wisdom and strength within organized labor. As a result, the American labor movement today is one of the strongest bastions against communism.

A second permanent target has been the Negro community. According to one of the tenets of Leninism the underprivileged minority group is ripe for revolution. Though time does not allow me to go into detail here, the failure of the Communist efforts among Negroes has been more conspicuous than in any other area. This has been due not only to the militant opposition to communism by the NAACP but also, and more fundamentally, the Communists have attempted to exploit rather than solve the problems of the Negro.

The third target group is the Armed Forces, which Lenin said must be infiltrated, subverted, and made ready for mutiny before a revolutionary situation could develop. Though the party no longer expects to bring about such a situation within the foreseeable future, it does exploit every event in the peace offensive in a concerted effort to influence servicemen, their families and draft-age youth. These efforts, and the cries to bring the boys home are designed for both psychological and practical weakening of our defenses.

The fourth target is the youth group—because, under Marxist-Leninist doctrine, to win the youth for communism is to win the future. Here the party attempts to capitalize on youth's uncertainty in today's world, on its lack of knowledge of our country's history and traditions of democratic institutions, and on youthful idealism and the desire to join an appealing cause.

To combat this we must seek to lead our young people to a deeper understanding of democratic values and provide them with the kind of challenges in community and national life which will harness their idealism.

The final permanent target group is that of the intellectuals. The party achieved some notable successes in this field, particularly during the 1920's and 1930's, though even then it was but a small minority of the total number. However, during the late 1940's and 1950's most of these defected from the party—and though some have simply adopted another kind of authoritarianism, many have become effective sources of strength in the anti-Communist effort.

COMMUNISTS FAIL TO FIND VETERANS AID

Since World War II there has emerged another group which has become a prime target of the Communist Party, U.S.A. That is the veterans group. The party has adopted several techniques in this respect, but whether through establishing its own front organizations or by trying to infiltrate such loyal organizations as the VFW and the American Legion its aims have been the same—to influence veterans to support the peace offensive and to press immediate demands for the solution of all the veterans' problems.

These then are the main groups which the Communist Party seeks to infiltrate, divide, and subvert to its own purposes. We know their aims and purposes to be illegal; but often their methods are legal. We thus have the problem of how to combat this conspiracy without sacrificing the legal safeguards and moral principles that underwrite our own freedom.

The answer to our problem is certainly not to turn into a nation of amateur detectives and informers, each suspecting his neighbor at the slightest show of nonconformity in thought and action. Nothing could serve the Communist purpose better than the development of such a divisive national temper.

ALL DEMOCRATIC AND FREE PEOPLES CAN AID

I would suggest five general principles that we might observe in combating the threat of international communism.

First, maintaining our regard for the Anglo-American tradition of law. When the respect for law begins to crumble the people become the victims of the perversion of power. The intemperate attacks on the Supreme Court we have sometimes witnessed do not serve the cause of freedom, whatever one might think of some of the Court's decisions.

Second—and this is the cornerstone of Western civilization—is the traditional respect for the individual. Nowhere in the lexicon of communism is the word "individual" acknowledged as meaningful—always it is the masses, the proletariat, the bourgeoisie, the capitalist, the progressive, or the revisionist—never is it the average sensible man or woman who experiences the fullness of the emotional and spiritual life.

And now to the third principle, which is to maintain the integrity and the spontaneity of the good life of friendship, compassion, and love—the very antithesis of the class hatred which the Communists seek to inculcate.

Fourth, we must seek to extend the principles of civil liberties and economic and social justice to all of our citizens, regardless of race, color, or creed. Only thus can we present to the world at large the true America. And let us not forget that approximately two-thirds of the world's population are composed of people of color—most of whom have only recently been freed from the white man's dominance.

Finally, we must seek to extend these ideals to other nations within the international community and to live with knowledge of the aspirations of others beyond our shores. The true and really "permanent revolution" was that of 1776—a revolution in the spirit of man, and not in the ownership of the means of production. If we but maintain the faith in the Revolution of 1776 we will have the necessary armament to combat the Communist onslaughts, whether psychological, political, economic, or military.

Happy 93d Birthday to You, Dr. Townsend

OF
HON. JAMES C. OLIVER
OF MAINE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, January 13, 1960

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, today, Wednesday, January 13, marks the 93d birthday of Dr. Francis E. Townsend, the father of the Townsend plan for retirement pensions for our senior citizens.

It has been my privilege to know and work with this great American over the past 25 years. These years, Mr. Speaker, have found him working tirelessly and courageously for justice for our elderly people. Many congressional leaders over the years have attributed to Dr. Townsend substantial credit for the Federal recognition through congressional action of the principle of social security for the American people. Knowing of his great contribution to the action and work necessary to arouse the people in support of any proposal in the general welfare, I can personally testify that this contribution of his has been even more than substantial. The elderly citizens of America owe Dr. Townsend a debt that can never be repaid.

It is only rarely that a man crusades as he has crusaded for a cause in the interests of people without hope of personal gain for himself or family. Dr. Townsend has been this type of a champion. He conceived of the idea that the great resources of America could and would support a social dividend for the retirement income of all of our citizens. He believed that this income, since it would be immediately and fully expended by its recipients, would serve as the continuing stimulus which our economy needs to employ our full resources, both human and material. In part, his idea has been proved during the recent recession. Many economists have stated that the built-in stabilizer of social security payments made a great contribution to the stability of personal income, thereby acting as a cushion for the decline in our economy, during 1957–58. Certainly, more stabilization through the larger pension payments of the Townsend plan would have been even more effective.

Having been one of the 97 Members of Congress who voted for consideration of the Townsend plan in the 76th Congress, I feel that Dr. Townsend has been justified in every way in making the efforts which he has made and in the observations which his organization has made available over the years to the citizens of the Nation, as well as the Congress of the United States.

Sincerity, strength of one's convictions, sympathy for one's fellow beings and dedication to a basic cause in the interests of the American people, together with devoted and unwavering action to reach the objective, symbolize the crusading stature of a man.

Dr. Francis E. Townsend measures up to these specifications and far beyond in my estimation. I have been and am proud to have been closely associated with him and his work. On his 93d birthday, I extend my warmest personal regards and rededicate myself to his goal.

Happy 93d birthday to you, Dr. Townsend, and may there be enough years left for you to see the realization of your dream; namely, justice for all of our senior citizens.

Anti-Semitism—Prank or Plan

OF
HON. DANTE B. FASCELL
OF FLORIDA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, January 13, 1960

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to add my voice to the ever-mounting chorus of protest to the widespread and deplorable acts of anti-Semitism and/or vandalism which have sickened responsible people throughout the world.

Since the Christmas Eve desecration of the Synagogue of Cologne, Germany, the world has been witness to a series of actions which has touched the shores of this Nation and penetrated to the District of Columbia, the seat of freedom and democracy in the world today.

Some of our colleagues already have risen in this Chamber to lend official volume to the sickness at heart we all feel at these actions which deny the existence of morality.

On Friday, January 8, 1960, there were reports in the Miami Herald, Miami, Fla., and in the Washington (D.C.) Daily News concerning acts of vandalism and of anti-Semitic natures. In Miami, Tampa, and Jacksonville, Fla., 14 painted Nazi swastikas were found; and in Miami 2 bomb threats were made against a synagogue. Four swastikas were splotched crudely on the same Jacksonville synagogue that was damaged by a bomb blast in April 1958.

In Washington, swastikas were smeared on the walls of two buildings in the Northwest section.

Now, it is not for me to say which of these despicable actions were planned to harass and deprecate, and which were acts of vandalism motivated by widespread publicity given preceding incidents.

However, it is for me and for all my distinguished colleagues to take note of these happenings, to protest against them and to explore thoroughly the problems they create with an eye toward answering the question, "What can be done about it?"

Honor for Representative Pillion

OF
HON. THADDEUS J. DULSKI
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, January 13, 1960

Mr. DULSKI. Mr. Speaker, each year during the past decade Buffalo's 10 most outstanding citizens have been chosen by the Buffalo Evening News.

It is my honor and privilege to call to the attention of the House the inclusion of one of its Members among those chosen for the 1959 roll of honor. Cited for outstanding achievement is my esteemed colleague from Erie County, the Honorable JOHN R. PILLION.

In selecting Mr. PILLION, the News said:

An able and effective champion of western New York interests in Washington and a rugged individualist whose outspoken and informed opinions are respected, Mr. PILLION, representing the 42d New York District in the Congress of the United States, has a wide range of interests which, nevertheless, do not divert him from personal service to his constituents and an active concern for the Niagara frontier. He labors without fanfare. His accomplishments are many.

During 1959, Mr. PILLION was one of the few to recognize the potential danger of Russian expansionist efforts in the Antarctic. To bolster his opinions the Congressman visited the Antarctic and endured innumerable hardships in order to weigh the vast, down-below continent's strategic importance.

Information he provided and arguments he advanced prompted administration policy which will preserve U.S. interests in the Antarctic in concert with other nations. The Antarctic will not fall under the domination of any single ideology.

Congressman PILLION can take pride in this accomplishment, among others, and future generations may have reason to be thankful that he had the foresight and the will single-handedly to press his case. His effort and ultimate success on the Antarctica issue alone is worthy of the plaudits of his constituents and the populace of western New York which he serves.

Also named outstanding Buffalo citizens in 1959 were:

Robert B. Abram, 45 Penhurst Place, for outstanding service as a merchant and as a community leader in sparking the rejuvenation and revitalization of the downtown Buffalo area.

Dr. Edgar C. Beck, 33 Gates Circle, for community service as an associate professor of medicine at the University of Buffalo Medical School, for his work in the field of diabetes detection, for his leadership in organizing medical alumni support for the university's basic science departments.

Judge Charles S. Desmond, Eden, for outstanding achievement in his chosen field of law, who was the bipartisan nominee for chief judge of the New York State Court of Appeals, first resident of Erie County to occupy this high court position.

George M. Frauenheim, 697 LeBrun Road, Eggertsville, for community service, as a Roman Catholic layman whose tireless efforts for the Buffalo diocese have brought aid and comfort to thousands of persons of all races and creeds, who in 1959 led both the successful Catholic charities appeal and the successful seminary fund drive.

Dr. James T. Grace, Jr., 19 Kimberly Drive, Williamsville, for outstanding achievement as a noted cancer research surgeon and as assistant director of Roswell Park Memorial Institute for leading a team of researchers in a significant discovery of a virus in certain human cancers.

James P. Kavanaugh, 2415 Seneca Street, for community service as executive secretary of the city planning board, in directing significant civic improvements like rebuilding the Ohio Street Bridge, and coordinating major rail and highway route changes to fit the city's future.

T. Emerson Murphy, 33 Gates Circle, for community service as a leader in work for underprivileged and handicapped children, as president of the Fresh Air Mission summer haven, and executive committee chairman for the Buffalo Evening News-Rotary Club crippled children's camp fund.

Ralph J. Petersen, Strykersville, for outstanding achievement as an industrial executive, and for community service as chairman of the 1959 Community Chest and Red Cross appeal which surpassed its goal—first time since the drives were combined 5 years ago.

Paschal A. Rubino, 25 Woodley Road, for community service as a leader in education, as a dedicated member of the board of education, and for his work with youth, with the boys club, the police athletic league, and with personal sponsorship of several teenage athletic teams.

Testimonial Dinner Tendered Louis G. Feldmann, Commander in Chief, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, Hazleton, Pa., December 12, 1959

OF
HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, January 13, 1960

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, December 12, 1959, nearly 600 friends of Louis G. Feldmann, commander in chief of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, packed Genetti's Pennsylvania Room at Hazleton, Pa., at a testimonial dinner in his honor. Guests representing all walks of life and from every section of the United States were in attendance and joined in paying a well-deserved tribute to one of Hazleton's prominent citizens.

It was my privilege to deliver the following address at the testimonial dinner.

This is indeed a happy occasion when we can gather to pay a well-deserved tribute to a local boy who has made good in so emphatic a way.

Hazleton, Luzerne County and Pennsylvania, are justly proud that the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States has honored Louis G. Feldmann by electing him as commander in chief.

We are taking this opportunity to tell Lou Feldmann that we are glad of the honor that has come to him, that we confidently accept his leadership, and that we intend to aid with all our power the efforts of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, under his command, to promote loyalty among Americans and peace and good will throughout the world.

It is an accepted fact that invariably every successful man owes a debt of gratitude to a woman whether it be his mother, wife, or sweetheart for the encouragement he receives in the daily battle of life.

Therefore, it is fitting that we pause in this tribute to Lou Feldmann and salute his good wife, Ann, who keeps the home fires burning as Lou moves through the air and over the highways and byways of the Nation.

The Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, as we all know, is one of the major veterans organizations of the country, numbering almost 1½ million members.

The Veterans of Foreign Wars with other similar veterans organizations, represents a large segment of the American population since the veteran population today numbers approximately 23 million persons.

In fact, veterans, with their immediate families, have recently been computed to comprise approximately 45 percent of the total population of the United States.

As veterans we have no interests and no wishes that separate us from the local and national community.

Like our neighbors, we receive the benefits and share the burdens of government.

We are of many races, creeds, and national origins.

We are of varying economic positions, and belong to different political parties, and to different schools of thought in many other respects.

Nevertheless, we share a common citizenship, and a common intensity of American patriotism.

The love of country that we all share, we have had occasion as veterans to prove by our deeds—yes, we have proved our love of country by labor and obedience, by bravery in the face of danger, by undergoing hardships and imprisonment, sickness and wounds, in the service of America.

With this history, we join to give effect to our concern for the general good of the Nation, to exercise our influence, to give leadership to the community, and particularly to the young.

In fact, we of the veterans organizations wish to make of our group a citadel of patriotism whose first concern is the welfare of all citizens.

It is, therefore, most fitting that the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, should have chosen for its commander in chief such a man as your friend and my friend, Louis G. Feldmann, whose character and career are typical of the ideal citizen.

Like many of you, Lou Feldmann is my own good friend and longtime associate.

Therefore, I can speak of him with much pleasure because like you, his neighbors, I know and admire his many fine qualities.

Lou Feldmann's career has been divided, as his professional life now is, between the two towns of Wilkes-Barre and Hazleton.

He was born in Wilkes-Barre, and spent his childhood there, attending St. Mary's Parochial High School.

Then he went to the University of Pennsylvania, earning the degree of bachelor of science in economics and then staying on for graduate work.

He studied law at Duquesne University, Pittsburgh, where he received his law degree.

As you know, he now lives in Hazleton, and practices law in both Hazleton and Wilkes-Barre.

Between the study of law and the practice of it, however, occurred the same essential interim occupation that commanded the attention of so many of us in the early 1940's.

With the strong sense of civic responsibility already evident in his choice of economics and law as studies, Lou Feldmann could not hold back from the fight upon which our national existence depended.

As a result, early in World War II he enlisted as a private in the U.S. Marine Corps.

Lou's talent for leadership was soon recognized, and he was assigned as a drill instructor at the Parris Island Marine Base, where he had the responsibility of training thousands of recruits for combat duty.

On January 13, 1945, he went overseas with Company G, 9th Regiment, 3d Marine Division, for service in the Asiatic-Pacific theater of operations.

Upon the conclusion of the war in the Pacific he was returned to the United States and discharged with the rank of sergeant.

Of course as we all know, the rank of sergeant in the Marine Corps—as the marines would say—compares favorably with that of a general or admiral in other branches of the service.

What the marines have in mind is that the authority of a sergeant in the Marine Corps is unequaled regardless of rank or rating in our Armed Forces.

If you doubt this interpretation let me suggest that you talk to any leatherneck after graduation from basic training at either Parris Island or San Diego.

So tonight we salute you, Sgt. Lou Feldmann.

Returning to Lou's biography, he resumed his interrupted civilian occupation, and soon passed his bar examinations, after which he was admitted to the Pennsylvania bar.

As we all know our honored guest ex-Marine Sgt. Louis Feldmann is an attorney of high professional standing and reputation, being a member of county, State, and National bar associations, and admitted to practice before the Supreme Court of the United States.

In his professional career, Lou has behind him an excellent record of public service, as district attorney of Luzerne County from 1951 to 1955.

Such a career is enough to keep any man busy, and reduce his community and organizational activity to a minimum, but Lou Feldmann has been so active in organizations, local, State, and National, that some people would probably be surprised to hear that he is a practicing lawyer.

Here in Hazleton, he is a member of the advisory board of the Salvation Army.

Chairman of the board of Catholic Charities, and a member of the Hazleton Educational Council.

He has been president both of the Hazleton Kiwanis Club and of Hazleton Mental Health, Inc., an organization devoted to the problems of mental health and their solution.

In 1956, at the request of Gov. George M. Leader, Lou served as a member of a State conference concerning mental health.

Strongly conscious of the danger to our country inherent in the current tendencies of juvenile delinquency and neglect by parents and other adults of their social and civic responsibilities our distinguished guest has given of his time and energy in touring the Nation in behalf of an energetic and practical approach to these problems.

He has gained national prominence in urging wider participation by citizens in public affairs on both the community and national levels.

In short, he has pleaded for a sympathetic and positive approach to the problems of youth.

But, though these activities would seem to make a more than full career for any man, it is within the organization of Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States that Lou Feldmann has been most active and outstanding.

Shortly after his return from overseas duty in World War II he joined the local post, No. 589, of the VFW and was soon elected its commander.

Proving his outstanding leadership he later became commander of the Anthracite Counties Council.

The representative of Pennsylvania VFW then recognized Lou's ability and understanding of the veteran problem by electing him as judge advocate of the Department of Pennsylvania, then vice commander of the Department of Pennsylvania, and finally in 1950 he was elected commander of the Department of Pennsylvania.

In 1951–52 he served as a member of the national council for administration, representing the Departments of New York and Pennsylvania.

In 1957, he was elected as junior vice commander in chief.

He became senior vice commander in chief in 1958.

In September of this year at Los Angeles the delegates representing nearly 1½ million oversea veterans selected him unanimously as their leader.

Therefore, tonight we honor Lou Feldmann as the commander in chief of a group of fighting men who compose the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States.

In bestowing upon Lou Feldmann the highest honor possible the membership of the VFW recognized particularly the extraordinary leadership that he demonstrated for 8 years as chairman of the VFW National Loyalty Day committee.

As chairman of this committee he distinguished himself as the leader of a group of patriots in the battle against communism in America and in the promotion of loyalty and responsible citizenship by our people.

As a symbol of this patriotic ambition—through Lou Feldman's efforts—it was my privilege to sponsor in Congress Loyalty Day legislation and to have the pleasure of seeing the measure enacted into law by proclaiming May 1 annually as Loyalty Day.

Like most veterans, our friend Lou Feldmann is well aware that our patriotism, like our family feeling, is best if it spreads out beyond narrow limits.

Therefore, he has been a leader, as chairman of the VFW Loyalty Day committee, in promoting the VFW pilgrimage projects that, in 1955 and 1957, were carried out in conjunction with President Eisenhower's "people to people" world friendship program.

Scores of VFW members visited countries of Europe and Latin America, under these projects, helping to promote better understanding between the United States and other free nations.

Under Commander in Chief Louis G. Feldmann, it is comforting to know that we can look to the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States to continue as a mighty sentinel in the United States, yes. A mighty sentinel advocating responsible thought and feeling for meeting the problems of a divided world, and for leading the free world both to greater freedom and to security and peace.

The Nation needs, I believe, more men of the energy, the high morality, the sense of neighborhood and public responsibility that characterize Louis G. Feldmann.

When I contemplate his character and career, I am reminded of the noble words of the poet, Josiah Gilbert Holland, in his prayer for great men to meet the needs of our country in a time of little men and widespread corruption and selfishness:

"God give us men. A time like this demands strong minds, stout hearts, true faith and ready hands; men whom the lust of office does not kill; men whom the spoils of office cannot buy; men who express opinions and a will; men who have honor; men who will not lie."

The Suez Canal and the World Bank

OF

HON. DANTE B. FASCELL

OF FLORIDA

Wednesday, January 13, 1960

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, in this, a year in which many critical issues face the Congress of the United States and in which there will be less time than usual for consideration, there exists a danger that many important questions will not get the attention they deserve.

One such important question deals with the $56 million loan recently granted the United Arab Republic by the World Bank. The money was sought for the widening and deepening of the Suez Canal, and was granted despite the U.A.R.'s flagrant disregard of the Constantinople Convention of 1888 and other agreements whose purposes are to guarantee freedom of use of the waterway to the vessels of all nations.

There is widespread concern in the Nation today over this loan and the State Department's favorable attitude to it. There is concern because the State Department's posture in this matter seems to contradict the February 20, 1957, statement of President Eisenhower which said that if Egypt violates the U.N. armistice agreement or other international obligations, "this should be dealt with firmly by the society of nations."

The fact today is that Egypt will not allow passage of Israeli shipping through the canal. And, in return for its illegal blockade, the U.A.R. receives $56 million from an international lending agency in which the United States is one-third owner.

Now, we all are aware that the Government of the United States has no direct relationship with the World Bank. U.S. participation in the Bank was authorized by the Congress and the United States holds about one-third of the stock; but the Bank is an independent institution, and there really is nothing the Congress can do with regard to the granting, or refusal of a loan.

At the same time, however, it would have been possible for the Eisenhower administration to make a realistic appraisal of the implications of an attitude favorable to the loan. The State Department has defended its attitude by saying that to inject noneconomical considerations into the World Bank's assessment of credit worthiness of an applicant would endanger the Bank's integrity.

This is a debatable proposition. However, I cannot help but believe that many people in the world find it difficult to square the U.S.-announced position of upholding the principle of freedom of transit through the Suez Canal with a position of no resistance to a loan of this size made to the nation that restricts freedom of passage.

Paul O. Peters

OF
HON. FRANK T. BOW
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, January 13, 1960

Mr. BOW. Mr. Speaker, a beloved figure is absent from Capitol Hill as we begin this session of Congress, and there are many of us who miss him deeply.

Paul O. Peters passed away, quietly, at his home in Arlington on December 30 and now is resting in Arlington National Cemetery.

For the past 10 years he has edited a daily news bulletin to which many of us subscribed. His skillful analysis of Government budgets and agency programs have often appeared in the pages of the RECORD. We will miss his daily calls and the service he rendered.

Paul Peters will be missed also in the great American conservation movement, of which he was a leader for many years. He was known throughout the Nation for his speeches and writings on conservation subjects. He served for many years as a national director of the Izaak Walton League and was instrumental in the establishment of the excellent Izaak Walton League facilities in nearby northern Virginia.

He will be missed by many who knew him only as "Porcupine, Jr.," the nom de plume he used in witty political columns that appeared in a number of journals.

His was a long and remarkable career. I have known few men who had as vast and varied a fund of knowledge or used their knowledge as wisely.

Mr. Peters' memory will be especially cherished in my home area by reason of his great generosity to the College of Wooster at Wooster, Ohio. Late last spring he announced his decision to give his library of some 90,000 volumes and various historical and art objects to the library of that college. He traveled to Wooster to announce that decision, and on his return expressed to many of us his great satisfaction with the institution.

Earlier he had been fearful that his collection, one of the most complete in existence on governmental and political subjects, would be dispersed at his death. It gave him great pleasure and satisfaction to know that it would be held together and made available for students of government and politics not only of the College of Wooster but many others who may be expected to visit Wooster to refer to the collection.

A new library is under construction at the college and special provision is being made for the Paul O. Peters Room which will house his collection. At the time of his death he was looking forward to consultations with the architect on the design of that room. He had already arranged the shipment of a part of the library.

One could recite many highlights of a long and useful life. Mr. Peters' investigations of political corruption in St. Louis won his newspaper a Pulitzer prize. His service as an investigator for the Small Business Committee of the House, under the chairmanship of Hon. Walter C. Ploeser, and later for the General Accounting Office, saved Americans many millions of tax dollars.

I like to recall an investigative trip he made to Alaska shortly after World War II. Though he was gone several weeks, his expense voucher asked for only $18. He did not believe in wasting tax dollars and he wasted none himself. He had made the trip hitchhiking on military aircraft, bunking in military barracks, and spending only a few dollars for film and cabfare.

He was one of the founders of the Outdoor Writers Association about 20 years ago and regularly attended its meetings.

Though his many friends miss him acutely, we take satisfaction in knowing that his many contributions in the various fields that interested him have built a memorial that will never fade.

Stevenson and Red China

OF
HON. HUGH SCOTT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, January 13, 1960

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, this is in the nature of a plea that American public figures be aware of the impact of their statements upon our friends and allies abroad.

Last month, the United Daily News of Taipei, Formosa, carried an editorial commenting on Mr. Adlai Stevenson's recent article in the magazine Foreign Affairs. Mr. Stevenson suggested recognition of Red China, if the Reds grant certain concessions.

These suggestions have shocked the people of the Republic of China, and the newspaper asks whether his utterance is a reflection of his personal opinion or that of the American Democratic Party. I think Mr. Stevenson owes the people in free China at least that much explanation.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the text of the editorial.

To clarify my own position in this matter of recognition of Red China, I ask unanimous consent that an article which I wrote recently and which appeared in the Philadelphia Bulletin and other newspapers, be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial and article were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A COMMENT ON STEVENSON'S RECOMMENDATIONS CONCERNING U.S. POLICY TOWARD THE FAR EAST

Mr. Adlai Stevenson, leader of the American Democratic Party, recently published an article in Foreign Affairs, a quarterly magazine, dealing with the current American foreign policy. In this article, the two-time U.S. Democratic presidential candidate, aside from making an overall review of the present American foreign policy, advanced some absurd recommendations concerning American policy to be pursued in the Far East.

Mr. Stevenson said: "World peace appears an unattainable goal as long as Communist China is barred from international society." "It is clear that no general control of disarmament has any value unless it includes Communist China, and it is difficult to see how Red China can accept international control when it is not formally a member of international society." He further suggested: "The West, through Soviet Premier Nikita Khrushchev, explore the possibility of peace in the area threatened by Red China through a broad settlement of issues—including Formosa—by negotiation, not by force." As to how this goal can be reached, he suggested that both sides make concessions. The concessions he expected the Chinese Communist regime to make include the following: (1) Accept the international disarmament control; (2) end the threat of force against Formosa and infiltration and subversion in southeast Asia; (3) accept a peaceful settlement on border controversy with India; (4) agree to a free election under U.N. supervision in Korea; and (5) agree to a plebiscite held under U.N. supervision for the inhabitants of Formosa to determine their own destiny. In exchange for these Communist concessions, he suggested that the West: (1) End American embargo on Red China's admission to the United States (not to be confused with diplomatic recognition); (2) persuade the Chinese Nationalist Government to evacuate from Quemoy and Matsu; and (3) include Korea and Japan in the atom-free zone and area of controlled disarmament. In other words, Mr. Stevenson's recommendations imply a sacrifice of Quemoy and Matsu, of the government of Free China in Taiwan, and of our right of representation in the United Nations as a means of inducing the Peiping Communist regime to give up its expansion policy and achieving an overall settlement in the Far East.

Back in September of 1952 when Mr. Stevenson first took part in the American presidential election, he proposed in a speech he made in the State of Oregon that, upon cessation of the Korean war, the United States accord diplomatic recognition to Red China. In another speech he made in a Democratic Party meeting held in Chicago on September 16, 1953, upon his return from a global tour, he said: "If we are to negotiate with Communists, we must have sincerity." Since then, we have not heard Mr. Stevenson utter any strong opinion in regard to China. We presumed that he, after he had been twice defeated in the American presidential election, must have realized the true desire and wish of the American people, and that he therefore refrained from making any further utterance on the China problem. The fact that he made the above-mentioned recommendations in a recent speech shows that he still adheres to his appeasement policy toward the Communists. It also shows his lack of farsightedness and personal prejudice toward China. His recommendations are even worse than the contents of the much-criticized Conlon report recently published by U.S. Congress.

We do not wish to evince our disrespect toward a prominent party leader of our most close ally nor shall we criticize him with stinging words. Nevertheless, we do regret that Mr. Stevenson as a leading figure in American politics should have advanced such absurd recommendations of policy toward a nation to which his own country is allied by a mutual defense treaty. Whether his utterance is a reflection of his personal opinion or that of the American Democratic Party as a whole, we solemnly say that such opinion is erroneous, unrealistic, and impracticable.

SENATORS DEBATE FOREIGN POLICY—SCOTT SUPPORTS STAND ON CHINA

(By Senator HUGH SCOTT, Republican, Pennsylvania)

The foreign policy of the United States is a continuing thing. Its principal objective—and it may seem strange that this needs saying—is to protect and further the best interests of the United States.

The vast body of Americans and most leaders of both political parties have supported the basic objectives of American foreign policy as they have been enunciated by President Eisenhower over the past 7 years.

But our foreign policy has its critics and they come bubbling to the surface most vigorously during election years when some candidates are forced to reach far out into left field in order to create issues.

Since we have very important elections scheduled for November of 1960, all citizens would be well advised to observe carefully criticisms which do arise on foreign policy and judge the statements accordingly.

I remember when I was running for election to the U.S. Senate last year I had to defend some administration policies which by now are generally accepted as being the wisest that could have been followed at the time. "The island of Quemoy is threatened but the issue transcends the value of one island off the China coast," I said in one Pennsylvania address, "The issue is whether the Reds will be able to shoot their way into all of Asia. The Communists understand strength and we are showing that in the Formosa Straits."

Those who, a year ago, urged that we yield the tiny island of Quemoy to the Red Chinese because it was a "liability" are very silent today. Our policy of meeting force with force sobered up the trigger-happy Communists.

Instead they turned their guns and saboteurs on countries like Tibet, Laos, and India where opposition was not so certain nor so dangerous to the Communist aims.

IN DIFFERENT FORM

The Red China issue is coming up again, but in a different form.

Some people are urging our Government to grant diplomatic recognition to Red China (which we have not done since that regime came into power after a bloody revolution in 1949), and to agree to admit that country into the United Nations. (The Republic of China on Formosa, not the Red regime, is a U.N. member.)

These people maintain that recognition of the Red regime in China would tend to bring it into the "family of nations," that this would exert some control over the Reds' actions, that evidence of good will on America's part would tend to encourage good will on the part of the Reds, that the Russians would begin to "come around" and why not the Red Chinese?

All of these arguments are false and I am strongly opposed either to admitting Red China into the U.N. or to granting them diplomatic recognition.

Red China is still at war with the United Nations. It still has not yet accounted for some American prisoners. In addition to barbarism against its own people, it has been guilty of grossly immoral international actions. If we did swallow our moral and ethical principles and grant recognition to the Red Chinese, what would we be accomplishing?

We would enhance their prestige. We would be delivering a body blow to the Republic of China on Formosa. We would shake the confidence of those independent nations in Asia which still have the courage to resist the Communists.

When Great Britain recognized the Red Chinese regime, this did not stop the Communists from confiscating immense British investments. And India, which has been scrupulously neutral in the East-West disputes, has for its good intentions only a growing border conflict and dead Indian soldiers.

GREATEST THREAT TO PEACE

The Red Chinese regime today is in no mood for negotiation. It wants conquest.

This regime, because of its expansionist aims and fanatical policies, constitutes probably the greatest single threat to peace in the world today.

When the leaders of a nation—any nation—act like civilized human beings our Government is ready to cooperate. President Eisenhower has said repeatedly that he is willing to go anywhere at any time—if by so doing he could promote the cause of peace.

In the past several months we have seen considerable evidence of that policy. When Mr. Khrushchev indicated that he wanted to talk over some problems which are causing international tensions, the President immediately invited the Russian Premier to visit the United States.

General Eisenhower now plans to visit Russia himself in the near future. But we need real evidence of good intentions and the Red Chinese leaders have only to indicate their sincere desire to negotiate and they will not have to look far to find our representatives.

PROSPECTS FOR THE FUTURE

We must understand that just as there is continuity to American foreign policy, so is there continuity to international problems.

The "cold war" with which we have lived for some 14 years will probably continue in one form or another for many years more.

This is not a pleasant thought. It is like being told by a doctor that we have chronic bronchitis.

We could disregard the condition or we could seek fast cure-alls. Either course of action would be foolhardy and might kill us.

Or we could learn to live with the condition and put our minds and energies to work in an all-out effort to solve the problem over whatever period of time it might take. This is the philosophy of the Eisenhower administration and I subscribe to it.

When we examine the record of President Eisenhower's two terms of office—which American voters will be doing intensively during the coming year—we must list his success in preserving world peace and justice as perhaps the greatest accomplishment of his years as President.

General Eisenhower extricated this Nation from the Korean war, kept us at peace while not yielding at any point to international communism, and now has brought the world closer to a realistic settlement of major international issues than it has been at any time since World War II.

OF

HON. CHARLES S. GUBSER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 13, 1960

Mr. GUBSER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address to the Third Industrial Nuclear Conference at Chicago, Ill., by Hon. CRAIG HOSMER, member of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy:

In commencing a talk, the usual order of things is a salutation of some kind. Most commonly "ladies and gentlemen" suffices. Perhaps semi-unrelated circumstances at this particular time might indicate I should start out by addressing you as "comrades." But I cannot bring myself to that.

Possibly the most accurately descriptive salutation I could use today, to this group, would be "pioneers and adventurers," since in the true and large sense—and both in relation to the economics of peaceful applications of atomic energy and the vast horizons for man's betterment just beginning to appear from the light of new knowledge—you are, indeed, and in the true sense, this modern day's "pioneers and adventurers."

Before discussing it, however, I would like to express my appreciation to the directors of the conference for permitting me, representing the membership of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, to express my personal views on these matters of mutual concern. And, particularly, to thank Dr. Alvin Weinberg for so graciously exchanging our speaking dates here to accommodate my schedule to be with the Joint Committee at the International Atomic Energy Agency's General Conference. Al's stimulating analysis of the problems of "Burning the Sea Versus Burning the Rocks" is a treat for which I apologize for your having to wait 2 more days.

His discussion—this Industrial Nuclear Conference—in fact, any real awareness of the nonmilitary applications of atomic knowledge were not grasped by a stunned world when in 1945 this great new force burst so explosively and destructively to public view.

It came not in a gradual, evolutionary manner as have other vital forces which are part of our civilization—in a manner which man could prepare his institutions and his thinking to control, direct, harness, and accept as part of his culture—it came, rather, as a full grown technology—suddenly, from behind a secrecy curtain—to confront a vast audience—a world, which was more prepared, even, to accept a man from Mars as reality, than the apparently terrifying monster it found before it.

Fortunately, the so-called monster, for the first 5 years of its public life, at least, had a kind and benevolent keeper—the United States of America.

During these years the world knew that its destructive power would not be irresponsibly unleashed upon it. During these years the awareness gradually grew that this great new force need not necessarily be a monster unless man made it so.

During these years—and since—man's "political scientists" have had opportunity to develop doctrines and philosophies which may fit this great force developed by man's "physical scientists" into our civilization and its cultural patterns as a factor for great good, rather than one for great evil.

I have emphasized the words "physical scientists" and "political scientists" because ask a physical scientist the question: "Where are scientific discoveries taking us?" and he will say he does not know. Often as not, he will tell you, "Ask the statesmen, the legislators, and the politicians."

Science can inform the culture to which it belongs, can contribute the tools to enhance understanding, can constantly remind of the universal nature of knowledge and of knowledge's refusal to be fettered. But it cannot take over control of a democracy without destroying the democratic spirit. The rules and regulations have to be worked out, in the main, by students and practitioners of the law, the political scientists.

Underlining this point of view—and in pleading both for public understanding and for public courage as our power over nature increases—Teller and Latter, in their book "Our Nuclear Future," explained it thusly:

"The real source of important decisions in our country is the people. We believe that this is rightly so, and we believe that it is not proper if scientists take over any essential part of these decisions."

And so, as it has been enunciated in theory—so has it been put to practice in our country.

Hardly had the wraps of military secrecy been taken off the atom, when in 1946 the Congress of the United States, representing the people, created within itself the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy as the legislative instrumentality to deal with the task of interweaving nuclear science and political science.

The task has proved both constant and complicated in the past. Undoubtedly it will continue to merit those same adjectives for many years to come.

Without exhausting, but merely hinting at some of the factors which make it so, let me list now—and later examine—just a few of them.

First, proper allocation of responsibilities between Federal, State, and local governments.

Second, adequate provision for health and safety.

Third, maintenance of proper economic relationships in a competitive society.

Fourth, protection of the public's stake in the Government's investment.

Fifth, the necessity for accelerating peacetime uses of atomic energy.

Sixth, considerations of defense and international relations.

And, incidentally, let me caution, that although these and many more factors may be conveniently listed as separate items, they are, in fact, often as numerous, interdependent and interrelated as the parts and pieces of a nuclear reactor.

The political scientist in conceiving workable legislation and policies often faces a task in his work comparable in complication and exactitude to that of the naval reactor designer about which Capt. R. V. Laney told the Joint Committee:

"Each naval reactor project has a specific end in view. Because the building time for the ship and for the reactor, and the reactor plant components are different, the ship is partly built when the plant and its components are still being designed. The ship's characteristics are frozen in advance. Her power requirements are very sharply defined. The myriad of parts, pieces, controls, and equipment must, the first time they operate in unison, operate correctly. There is a very high premium on success."

And so, indeed, there is a very high premium on success for the highly complicated operations in the field of political science carried on by the Joint Atomic Committee.

It was for this reason, combined with necessary weapons security that the committee was established as a Joint Committee of both the House of Representatives and the Senate, composed of nine members from each body, rather than as separate committees of each body as is the normal procedure. These considerations also had something to do with the size of the Joint Committee, which is about half the number of members of the usual congressional committee.

This kind of organization has led to infrequent changes in committee membership and has permitted the buildup of a tremendous reservoir of knowledge and practical experience amongst its membership, five of whom have served on the committee since its inception.

Our chairman, Senator ANDERSON of New Mexico, combining position, knowledge, long experience, seniority, and legislative skill is one of the world's acknowledged leaders in this field. And, I can pay him this tribute sincerely, since we are members of opposing political parties.

By law, the Joint Committee is required to make continuing studies of the Atomic Energy Commission and of problems relating to the development, use and control of atomic energy.

The committee also has a duty to investigate and report to the Congress—and thus to the people—recommendations with respect to matters within its jurisdiction. It is in compliance with this requirement that the Joint Committee regularly holds hearings which, to the greatest extent possible within the bounds of security, are open to the public—and thus give the public at large an opportunity to become knowledgeable of the available facts and special problems in the atomic energy field.

Not all of our hearings can be open, of course. Security requirements necessitate that about half of them be held behind closed doors in executive session. In most instances, however, when executive sessions involve major policy decisions, after deletion of classified information, a record of the committee's deliberations is published and distributed.

Realistically, the Joint Committee would still perform an invaluable public service if it performed no further function than such dissemination of authoritative information to the American public and to the people of the world—information which permits laymen to stabilize their hopes and their fears at some realistic point between the depths of utter despair and the heights of unreasonable expectation, which, too often, have alternately characterized the public approach to problems of the nuclear age.

At this point—after such a buildup for the Joint Committee—I would be less than candid if I did not make the frank admission that neither is the Joint Atomic Committee's chambers a latter-day temple for 18 living gods—nor do the committee's 18 members regard themselves as such—at least, there is an honest division of opinion on the matter.

The ground to be covered in exercising the committee's responsibilities is of such magnitude that, in carrying out other legislative duties, members may be well informed, although they may not always be as expertly informed upon particular matters at hand for action as they would like to be.

This gap is filled reasonably well in two ways: By the breaking down of the committee into several subcommittees, allowing certain specializations amongst members, and, by the assistance of an able committee staff, supplemented from time to time by outside consultants and experts from various government departments and agencies.

Although the Joint Committee has often exercised remarkable vision and imaginative leadership in formulating national nuclear policies—an outstanding example of which was its insistence upon development of nuclear fusion—it has sometimes overlooked action on more mundane and less dramatic problems, which, nevertheless, deserve attention.

In this category—and purely as a personal opinion—I submit the organizational problem of the Atomic Energy Commission itself, as well as the Joint Committee's relationships with the Commission.

Perhaps I am wrong, and again I emphasize it is my own, and not the committee's opinion, but possibly we should be thinking in terms of an atomic energy agency, or even a department—rather than an Atomic Energy Commission to direct the executive department's administration of atomic energy functions.

From the management standpoint, multiple membership bodies generally have proved less able to direct effectively than where a single head is provided, with perhaps an advisory board to assist in policy matters as distinguished from sharing exercise of administrative authority.

Again, expressing personal opinion, I sometimes feel that as between members of the Joint Committee and members of the Atomic Energy Commission, there exists only a shadowy and blurred understanding of which policy matters are to be decided by the committee and which by the Commission, even sometimes as to what are matters of policy and what are matters of administration. This needs clarification by force of law rather than force of personalities and custom.

A need also exists for a clearer definition of the relative precedence between the Chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Defense, various ad hoc committees, advisers and others in speaking with and advising the President on atomic energy matters.

Unfortunately, my criticism as to these points, and other which I have not mentioned, are subject to a fatal fault—I do not have the authority of pat solutions at hand to backstop them. But perhaps, the validity of the criticism, as well as the solutions if any are needed, could become apparent if our committee finds time to delve into the matter by way of its usual complete and thorough hearings procedure.

The process of these hearings is a somewhat interesting one. Some of you have testified before the committee—always with skill, but often with trepidation—others may have been in one way or another influenced by their outcome.

Annual hearings are held in connection with the AEC's yearly expenditure authorization. Also, the Atomic Energy Act requires during the first 60 days of each session of Congress hearing to receive information concerning the development, growth and state of the atomic energy industry. These are the so-called "202" hearings named for the section of the act requiring them. It is the chairman's prerogative to select additional subjects of inquiry, either in support of particular legislative proposals, or of a more general nature.

The committee staff carefully lines up the panel of witnesses. It aims at obtaining the best informed experts who should be heard, as well as permitting those who insist upon being heard to testify.

The somewhat anomalous position of the Joint Committee—being a creature of neither House, but of both—has thus far prevented it from obtaining a regular room for public hearings. As a consequence rooms must be borrowed from other committees, accounting for your inconvenience and ours in shifting between numerous rooms during the course of any extensive hearing.

Usually, before the hearing starts, the committee meets in executive session for a preparatory skull session. During the hearings, those of you who have attended, have noted that seldom does a witness proceed very far before he is interrupted by questions and possibly even a longwinded discussion among the committee itself.

This may be either on the subject at hand, or all too often—being the political animals we are—on something more related to the day's political headlines. Nonetheless, it is usually a fairly well informed discussion, irrespective of the subject.

I can assure you that the Member of Congress is not—repeat, not—a member of our committee—and this really happened—the one who listened very intently to a learned briefing on atomic energy—then, being the question period, asked:

"Doctor, what is the native habitat of the atom?"

Following a hearing, the staff prepares a draft report summarizing the information obtained and setting forth the committee's proposed conclusions and recommendations. I believe you would be amazed to see the care and attention committee members devote to this document. Many, many long hours are spent refining them around the green-clothed table in the somewhat shabby committee executive room in the Capitol at the base of the cornerstone laid by President George Washington.

Every effort is made to write a report that is acceptable to all members, that is fair, knowledgeable, and of benefit to some phase of our nuclear effort. Only when a somewhat fundemental divergence of philosophical opinion arises, do we issue a report containing separate or supplemental views to those expressed by the majority of members.

Well, so much for the processes of these political scientists—I would like to turn now to those complicated factors with which they deal that I listed earlier.

The first two I mentioned concern problems of health and safety and the proper division of responsibilities between Federal, State, and local governments under our constitutional system. These I will discuss together, both because of their interrelation and because discussing them together is a particularly forceful way to emphasize that solving most problems of the nuclear age is not a matter of totally new concepts, but rather, one of adapting old institutions and old cultural patterns to new forces.

In their wisdom and their fear of power concentration, the Founding Fathers not only split and divided the functions of Government between legislative, executive, and judicial branches of the Federal Government, but made a further division of power between the Federal Government and the States.

Development of nuclear weapons was clearly a function of the Federal Government under its constitutional responsibility "to provide for the common defense." Under conditions through 1945, it was clearly a Federal responsibility to corral and nationalize every gram of fissionable material going into these devices, from mining the ore to the finished product.

All aspects of the production flow, including the health and safety of workers and the public at large, were thus clearly an exclusive function of the Federal Government.

With the advent of peace and the projection of atomic matters into the civilian side of our life, this clear-cut delineation of exclusive Federal authority faded—and faded fast.

If nuclear materials were to be utilized in civilian pursuits, they had to be placed in civilian hands. The law had to be changed, and it was changed to permit this.

In civilian hands, health and safety consideration pertaining to fissionable material came to an area where the States and other subdivisions—not the Federal Government—commonly exercised the major health and safety responsibilities. Pressures built up for such a shift of responsibilities to the States.

In order to exercise them, State and local authorities had to acquire knowledge and techniques that theretofore had been a Federal monopoly. This was permitted.

On the other side of the coin, certain factors appeared mitigating against this transfer to the States. American business and industry, seeking to employ the new technology throughout the country, could not stand a burden of complying with 50 separate, differing State health and safety regulations, let alone the multitudinously complex situation if all America's town councils were to come up their own unique ideas of what is safe and what is not safe conduct with regard to atomic energy—and each town cop could, in his turn, decide whether or not industry was complying.

It seems almost impossible that an answer could be found adapting our old institutions to this kind of situation. Yet, it is being found, gradually applied, and, I think, rather successfully.

Congress has just passed enabling legislation and today—at AEC headquarters in Germantown—groundwork is being laid for the initial transfer of regulatory authority over AEC licensed isotope applications to the States as rapidly as each State can show it is equipped to do the job and agrees to do it.

In order to avoid nonuniformity, it is required that a State's regulation must be either identical or compatible with AEC's. There must also be an adequate, trained staff at the State level, which AEC will help to prepare through recruitment and training programs. Once an official transfer is accomplished, there will be no dual, Federal-State jurisdiction in the field covered.

From this pattern of responsibility shift in the field of isotope application, it is easy to project similar shifts in the future with respect to reactors, fuel processing and in other appropriate areas.

Turning now to two more of the difficult factors faced by the political scientists in adjusting our lives and institutions to the nuclear age, we again find that discussing them together is more valuable and more feasible than trying to analyze them separately. They are the economic relationships of nuclear industries in a competitive society, and, the protection of the people's vast investment required to bring about the nuclear age.

To date, some $25 billion have been invested in nuclear science by the people of America. This does not include other billions buried in related Government programs. It is just the money appropriated to date to the Manhattan District, and its successor, the AEC.

How, and in what manner can the knowledge and the hardware so expensively acquired be utilized so that the people receive back the maximum return on their public dollars?

Can, and should, this return be made in dollar amounts, or is it better and more practical that it filter back, somehow, through improved living standards, better food and medical care, better and possibly cheaper products of industry, and in other ways?

Should the Government seek to monopolize, say, the nuclear-electricity production field, and recoup those $25 billion by a surcharge over the cost of power production?

Could it do so if it wanted to?

How, and in what manner, can this Government pass on to competitive American industry knowledge and technology of nuclear application in a manner that gives no one corporation a practical monopoly, but stimulates amongst industry the normal competition basic to a free enterprise economic system?

These questions open up a Pandora's box of problems that make the Federal-State jurisdictional question elementary in comparison. Yet they are the questions that inhere in—and require either the answering or the ignoring—each time Congress deals with almost any aspect of industrial development of atomic energy by free, competitive enterprise.

In these regards, applications involving radioisotopes have been amongst the easier with which to deal.

Cost of production, plus capital and overhead price tags can be calculated and affixed to products supplied by Government installations. Thus a fair return to the public Treasury can be assured.

Although general industrial, medical and other peacetime isotope applications are expensive, their price in relation to most of American industry's ability to pay is not exorbitant. There is also the practical assurance that when it is paid, the investment will make a profit. Thus, in this field, the factors exist which stimulate competition and stifle monopoly, all to the good of the American public which enjoys the fruits of this remarkably productive economic system.

But when you get over into other atomic energy applications by American industry, the situation changes. For instance, economic production of electricity from nuclear fuels. It is a tremendously expensive proposition, not only in the research and development stages, but in capital plant costs. Some of the needed research and development already has been done in Government laboratories or under Government contract. Industry may build on that—but how—and how much should it pay for it?

Even if some one industrial giant could carry the whole accomplishment from beginning to end—with its own capital—acquiring its own patents, the result would be that giant's monopoly, which is contrary to the interests of a competitive society. How is this to be avoided?

I have raised more questions than I have answered on these points—simply because there seems to be no universally applicable solutions that can be painted on with a legislative brush. Each time Congress has dealt with the subject, whether it has been on the question of patents, of the various reactor demonstration rounds in the nuclear power program, or otherwise, it, too, has had to leave to time the answer to parts of both the economic competition and the protection of the public's stake questions.

This has not been wholly because those problems are, in and of themselves, insoluble. But often because—in a broad view of the national interest—their solution has deserved a lesser priority than the fifth complicating factor I listed in the political scientists' labors—that involving a necessity to accelerate peacetime uses of atomic energy.

That point needs no belaboring before a group such as this. There is not only a humane necessity that mankind be brought all the peaceful benefits of the atom at the soonest possible moment, but there is a vitally compelling necessity to do so in this era of deadly competition for survival between us, the inheritors and beneficiaries of Western Civilization, and those behind the Iron Curtain to whom freedom, liberty, and justice are evils to be ruthlessly exterminated.

Thus it is that many of our programs, much of our public expenditures, and an overriding consideration in our approach to peaceful atomic energy application, stems from this basic, though regrettable fact of international life. These positive and peaceful applications of nuclear force are as fundamental to ultimate victory as is the effective capability to use that power in weapons configurations if should ever the need arise.

My mention of the committee meeting almost half its time in executive session is ample indication that defensive weaponry and international relations deserves a major position in the list of complications confronting the political scientist dealing with nuclear science.

What precise part the Joint Committee plays in the weapons program neither can—nor should—be discussed outside its constantly guarded committee room. It is suffice to say that not only is the membership currently and fully informed of all developments—technical, tactical and strategical—but it also exercises a considerably inventive leadership as regards them.

There is full appreciation that without the added power of nuclear weapons capability the free world cannot match the Communist bloc's overwhelming manpower superiority in the use of conventional weapons.

It was upon this premise that the committee took the leadership in suggesting—and assumed the burden of obtaining public concurrence—to the recent exchange of information with NATO allies which will allow them effectively to use nuclear weapons supplied by the United States if hostilities should break out. Yet, which does not afford the nonnuclear power technical information which might permit them to join the Nuclear Club.

At the same time, the committee has exercised its influence with respect to test-ban negotiations, and related disarmament negotiations, so that within the requirements for sufficient strength to resist either nuclear or conventional blackmail by the U.S.S.R., this Nation can not only follow, but as well proudly lead in the effort to relax world tensions.

In conclusion let me say this: I have dwelt long upon the political scientist's place and responsibilities in this modern age of unique opportunity and unique danger. I have done so simply because I lack the technical background to discuss with you, the physical scientist, your own work, on your own terms, in your own language. Your work—the physical scientist's work—is that which is true and basic to mankind throughout the ages past and the ages to come.

My work—the political scientist's—is more transitory in effect, and as a consequence less meaningful to mankind.

I salute you for your accomplishments—I thank you for your dedication.

Area Redevelopment Bill

OF
HON. CORNELIUS E. GALLAGHER OF NEW JERSEY
Wednesday, January 13, 1960

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Speaker, the flight of industry from many of our larger cities is a problem of increasing proportion. If we are to sustain these cities as healthy and profitable economic and industrialized complexes, it will be necessary that we establish programs for modernization and rehabilitation of facilities which have long since outlived their usefulness.

Unless we do this, we may find that before too many years these cities with their large populations will have reached the point of industrial decay where they will be unable to support the large number of our citizens who continue to live there.

These facts demand a prompt and realistic program such as would be authorized by the area redevelopment bill.

I am hopeful that this bill will be brought to the floor for a vote in the very near future.

Wheat Stabilization Plan

OF
HON. J. FLOYD BREEDING OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, January 13, 1960

Mr. BREEDING. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I would like to call to the attention of this body a letter which I directed to the Secretary of Agriculture on January 5, 1960, calling for a wheat stabilization plan for agriculture. The letter is as follows:

LETTER TO THE SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE

During the congressional recess, it was my privilege to talk with hundreds of wheat producers not only in Kansas, but in other great wheat growing States.

I returned to Washington with one definite and strong impression; Wheat growers believe that something should be done to help correct the present wheat situation, and at least 75 percent of them believe this can best be accomplished by the passage of a wheat stabilization program.

Many taxpayers are very unhappy with the present wheat surplus, which is stored in warehouses at a great cost to them. They want Congress to act.

I am convinced that wheat farmers will overwhelmingly and enthusiastically support legislation to put into effect a wheat stabilization plan such as that developed by the National Association of Wheat Growers, and introduced in the Congress last year.

In all honesty, I must also report that my talks with hundreds of farmers failed to uncover any significant support for your plan to abolish the parity concept and base supports on the average price of the past 3 years, resulting in a price of about $1.30 a bushel for wheat.

But farmers will fight hard for a wheat stabilization program which provides: (1) Quotas and allotments based on a bushelage basis; (2) full parity supports for wheat going into domestic consumption; and (3) no supports at all for all other wheat.

This plan has several advantages. It affords the farmer an opportunity to receive true parity for that part of his crop sold on the domestic market, where he must pay full parity for everything he buys. It enables him to sell on the world market at world prices. It curtails surpluses and sizable storage costs to the Government. And it should return wheat production to the historic wheat-producing areas.

The purpose of this letter is to urge you to support a wheat stabilization program. Congress will pass such a plan easily with administration support. I am sure the threat of a veto would be sufficient to kill the legislation.

We need wheat legislation. It is evident Congress is not going to approve a bill such as you have recommended. And the administration has indicated time and time again it will not accept a program based on high fixed supports.

Therefore, it seems to me the wheat stabilization plan offers the basis for getting together on a workable program. The National Wheat Growers Association and State associations throughout the wheat area have endorsed such a plan. I believe the National Grange will gladly support the program, as well as the Farmers Union. Unfortunately, officials of the American Farm Bureau Federation continue to oppose the plan, despite its strong support among rank-and-file members.

If you would recommend legislation of this type, I believe it could be passed by Congress in short order and we would dispose of a troublesome and vexing problem in a manner that would be fair to the farmers and to the taxpayers.

But if you insist upon recommending once more your plan for lower prices without any hope of great production in the near future, I am sure the present stalemate will continue. No one can benefit from a continued stalemate.

I urge you to give this proposal serious consideration. It offers one way of achieving positive results.

OF
HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, January 13, 1960

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of orienting the science teachers of Pennsylvania's high schools in the field of peaceful uses of the atom, the Pennsylvania Electric Co., in cooperation with the Pittsburgh section of the American Nuclear Society, conducted two interesting symposiums, one at Erie, Pa., October 3, 1959, and the other at Altoona, Pa., October 10, 1959.

Both of the symposiums were well attended and consumed the entire day. As a participant in these two symposiums it was my privilege to deliver the following address titled "Human Energy: A Necessity in the Atomic Age."

HUMAN ENERGY: A NECESSITY IN THE ATOMIC AGE

(By Representative JAMES E. VAN ZANDT, Member of Congress, 20th District of Pennsylvania, on the occasion of Nuclear Science Day sponsored by the Pittsburgh section of the American Nuclear Science Society, Altoona, Pa., Saturday, October 10)

When a Member of Congress speaks to a gathering of science teachers about atomic energy, it seems to me only fair that he should first describe the margin of his authority.

I cannot pose as an expert on the theory of atomic energy, but am simply a Member of your National Legislative Body who has enjoyed special advantages in serving on the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy.

The Joint Committee on Atomic Energy was established by the Atomic Energy Act of 1946, and has continued under subsequent legislation to make continuing studies of the activities of the Atomic Energy Commission and of problems relating to the development, use, and control of atomic energy.

Our committee is kept fully and currently informed with respect to the Commission's activities.

Legislation relating primarily to the Commission or to atomic energy matters is referred to the committee.

The membership is composed of nine Members of the Senate and nine Members of the House of Representatives.

The release of atomic energy presented to mankind perhaps the greatest challenge of all time.

Either we must rise to heights of international cooperation undreamed of in the past, or we shall see our civilization, and a great part of all humanity itself, wiped out in a new war in which the atomic bomb will be the chief, perhaps the only, weapon; a war which, in horror, will be beyond imagination—more terrible than anything mankind has experienced in the past.

And conversely, if we can manage to live peaceably together, the energy the atom will give us will become a limitless source of power.

The cost will be slight in proportion to the usefulness.

The arrival of the atomic age made most of our past thinking about military and naval strategy obsolete.

Yet if we can only manage through the years to use atomic energy for constructive and not destructive purposes—what a vision of the future we can see.

The scientists who worked on the bomb devoted themselves strictly to that task.

It was the consensus among them that engines using atomic power were not more than 10 or 20 years away.

They were entirely correct.

I recall that following a meeting of the Joint Atomic Energy Committee held aboard the Nautilus on March 20, 1955, I predicted that nuclear-powered submarines soon would replace most surface warships other than carriers and cruisers, and that large surface craft such as carriers and cruisers would be powered by nuclear engines.

You explain to the young folks in your classrooms that the atomic energy of a pound of coal exceeds its energy, when it is burned, by more than a billion to one.

Someone has pointed out that the atoms in a dime would drive a train a thousand miles; a glass of water would send the Queen Mary half a dozen times across the ocean—and so on.

We cannot forget, ladies and gentlemen, that we must walk before we can run.

We cannot solve the stupendous new problems which confront the world unless we prove ourselves capable of solving the lesser, stubborn questions which were facing us before the first atomic bomb went off on that rainy July morning in New Mexico.

For long and weary years we have been devoted to defensive purposes.

We have been trying desperately, and much of the time against heavy odds, to keep alive human freedom and the dignity of the individual.

In the past decade the United States has taken enormous strides in technological development.

Whole new vistas have been opened as a result of these advances and consequently the demand for skilled talent in almost all fields of endeavor is unprecedented.

This has been particularly evident in the fields of science and engineering where shortages in some instances have reached the critical stage.

At a time when science and technology are the key both to military superiority and to economic strength, the popular consciousness of the need for men and women to man the laboratories, the drawing boards, and the production lines is essential and understandable.

These statements form the basic opinion of the Subcommittee on Research and Development of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy.

As a member of that subcommittee, I have been vitally interested in the solution to our shortage of scientific and engineering manpower.

In April and May of 1956, the subcommittee conducted extensive hearings and subsequently has issued several reports.

It is important that we recognize our serious shortages are not entirely signs of failure.

There are indications of success.

A way of life has been created in which the demands made for superior skills in every field have become so tremendous that growth and expansion have become constant elements in our normal pattern of living.

A society has been created in which progress is not simply a matter of occasional spurts and short-term crises.

Rapid progress has become a normal part of our national life.

The skilled manpower to keep up with this steadily and rapidly advancing march of progress will be in demand for years to come.

I think it is important that we understand the basic principles which have guided Congress in the formulation of the legislation that has created and given authority to the Atomic Energy Commission, particularly in the light of peaceful uses of atomic energy.

The Atomic Energy Commission was established by the Atomic Energy Act to effectuate the declared policy of the United States that, subject at all times to the paramount objective of making the maximum contribution to the common defense and security, the development, use, and control of atomic energy shall be directed so as to promote world peace—improve the general welfare, increase the standard of living, and strengthen free competition in private enterprise.

The Atomic Energy Act provides for the following major programs relating to atomic energy:

1. A program of conducting, assisting, and fostering research and development in order to encourage maximum scientific and industrial progress;

2. A program for the dissemination of unclassified scientific and technical information and for the control, dissemination, and declassification of restricted data, subject to appropriate safeguards, so as to encourage scientific and industrial progress;

3. A program for Government control of the possession, use, and production of atomic energy and special nuclear material so directed as to make the maximum contribution to the common defense and security and the national welfare;

4. A program to encourage widespread participation in the development and utilization of atomic energy for peaceful purposes to the maximum extent consistent with the common defense and security and with the health and safety of the public;

5. A program of international cooperation to promote the common defense and security and to make available to cooperating nations the benefits of peaceful applications of atomic energy as widely as expanding technology and considerations of the common defense and security will permit; and

6. A program of administration which will be consistent with the foregoing policies and programs, with international arrangements, and with agreements for cooperation, which will enable the Congress to be currently informed so as to take further legislative action as may be appropriate.

The amendment of 1954 to the original act laid down the principles that have guided our Government's policies and actions in fostering development of a private atomic energy industry, and in furthering worldwide cooperation in peaceful uses of atomic energy.

The revision of the basic atomic energy law was sought for three reasons:

1. To permit the entry of private enterprise into the field of atomic power.

2. To make it possible to give the Nation's allies sufficient information to train troops in the use of atomic weapons.

3. To pave the way for the international atomic energy pool previously proposed by the President.

Under the amended law, private companies may apply to the U.S. Atomic Energy Commission for permission to construct atomic powerplants.

The Atomic Energy Commission has relied upon industry to exert its initiative in the atomic energy industry and, as the record shows, private companies have moved ahead in many aspects of the industry.

Moreover, industry at all times has supported the Commission through consultation and advice in planning actions and policies to encourage further participation by industry.

All the research programs of the Commission, except for those areas primarily of military importance, are conducted in support of the progress in the peaceful uses of atomic energy.

This includes:

(a) The broad underlying structure of research in biological and medical fields which contribute to safety and health.

(b) It includes the fundamental work in the fields of chemistry and physics—of metallurgy and materials—of controlled thermonuclear reactions.

(c) It includes research on fundamentals of reactor design, reactor materials and processes, and reactor safety, as well as in the specific fields of attaining economic power.

We are, in essence, engaged in a battle for brainpower.

The price of progress and prosperity continues to be an increasing effort to develop our intellectual resources to the maximum.

It is almost universally conceded that there is a critical shortage of technically trained manpower in this country.

But the nature of the crisis is not generally understood and the remedies frequently suggested tend to deal with the superficial and immediate problems rather than the more basic causes of the shortage.

In the interim report of the subcommittee on research and development on the shortage of scientific and engineering manpower, we came to the sharp conclusion that the fundamental problem is not that the United States lacks manpower in one limited, clearly separable area.

Modern defense is total.

It cannot be achieved in the ancient manner of putting up a few strong, scattered forts.

To the contrary, it demands strength throughout the entire fabric of national life.

And further, it requires the kind of cohesion and total national well-being that no military or peacefully competitive contest of the past has ever demanded.

The important fact is that the shortages of educated, skilled brainpower extend to all areas—from the drawing boards to distribution—from engineering to management—from the laboratory to the classroom.

There is an unprecedented demand for more skilled, educated brains.

The demand will increase for many years to come.

Therefore, the shortage will become more critical.

But it would be tragic if—as the committee was warned—the United States is stampeded into shortsighted action.

The committee was reminded of widespread forecasts made shortly after World War II, which predicted an oversupply of engineers and, at least by implication, encouraged high school guidance counselors to steer young people into other vocational channels.

These estimates were not inaccurate—at the particular time and based only on the immediate, short-range picture.

But our committee determined they were tragically wrong in terms of the future.

The point, therefore, is that the critical shortages of manpower should be considered a total shortage of trained individuals in every field, and that in our efforts to remedy short-term deficiencies we should be careful not to create imbalances which will threaten our overall strength in the long run.

With clarity of vision, the Founding Fathers realized that our form of government could not survive without education, and the infant Republic set its face toward a goal of free and universal education.

According to our present standards that goal has not been perfectly realized, but the principle is established and we have moved steadily forward toward its achievement.

The urgency of education becomes preeminent if human freedoms are to survive.

But education for freedom in the atomic age takes in much more territory than education for freedom in the horse-and-buggy age.

World War II had a tremendous influence upon education and educational methods.

Men had to learn well and to learn quickly.

The GI bill of rights opened the doors of higher educational institutions on a more common basis than ever before in our history.

Men who raised the flag on Iwo Jima or stormed the beaches of Normandy brought a grim determination to their studies.

The development of atomic energy affected education because of our realization that educational opportunities had to be broadened and educational methods had to be improved if we are to save our heritage of freedom.

Atomic energy is toil saving only for certain groups.

It may make it possible for the stoker to lay aside his shovel, but it will not permit the scientist to leave his laboratory, or the public servant to forget the cares of his office.

Most emphatically, it will not permit the schoolchild to discard his books.

The schoolboy and schoolgirl must learn geography and mathematics and economics and physics and chemistry and biology—and all the rest—to a degree of thoroughness never before approached.

Now I should like to bring to your attention the words of Vice Adm. Hyman G. Rickover, of the Bureau of Ships, and more specifically—Assistant Chief of the Bureau of Ships for Nuclear Propulsion.

Admiral Rickover was also head of the atomic powered submarine projects—the Nautilus and the Seawolf.

For the past 11 years his work has been in the field of nuclear power.

His concern has not only been with the problems of developing the new source of energy—atomic energy—but he has recognized, and has expressed before our committee, his awareness of the larger problem—how to provide the trained men and women to maintain the momentum of our rapidly expanding technical civilization.

His approach has been realistic and I should like to quote the following remarks he made before our committee in 1956:

"The failure in education is not the fault of the educators alone.

"It is the fault of all of us in not recognizing the impact of the 20th century scientific revolution and taking the necessary measures in time."

Admiral Rickover said further: "First, we must see to it that every young man and woman who is qualified obtains a college education.

"Today less than half of those capable of acquiring a college degree enter college.

"Sixty percent of the best students graduating from high school do not go to college.

"This is a tremendous loss of talent amounting to 250,000 students each year.

"And nearly half of all those who do start college do not graduate."

In addition, Admiral Rickover stated that, "for every high school graduate who eventually earns a doctoral degree there are 25 others who have the intellectual ability to achieve that degree, but do not.

"We simply cannot afford a waste such as this."

Admiral Rickover has reminded us, and again I quote, "Unless we quickly remedy the present treatment of our teaching and scholarly resources we will inevitably have morally and intellectually incompetent teaching staffs."

He continued by saying, "The United States, if it is to succeed in its role of world leadership, must produce citizens who have the wisdom, the vision, and the knowledge to grapple successfully with world problems; citizens who can see critically through conventional values and who are able to subject to principle and to reason all claims to power.

"In the conditions of modern life the rule is absolute, the race which does not value trained intelligence is lost.

"It will matter little what other educational institutions possess if they neglect to recognize and to foster high ability wherever it is found."

My friends, we are continually led to the basic fact that there is no single or final solution to the shortage of skilled manpower and that the efforts of all—Government and private—will be required if we are to make progress.

The shortage of scientific and engineering manpower is only part of a larger national problem.

It involves the need for trained and competent people in all fields of endeavor.

Our main objective should be the development of all our intellectual resources.

No longer do we stand merely at the threshold of atomic power development.

Vague promise has now turned into reality the perplexing problems which accompany a complicated technique.

Scientific advances are coming so fast that it is difficult to predict the ultimate place of nuclear power.

All of man's freedoms have come into existence only as results of his conquest of the power beyond that in his own muscles.

In recent centuries the tempo of civilization can be linked directly to the amount of energy man has had available to him for carrying on his activities.

When coal gave us a large increase in available energy, we went forward through a rapidly expanding phase of civilization.

Now, as atomic energy becomes available, we are going forward with a resounding crescendo.

We must remember that even though a man has fine ideals of citizenship, is thoroughly socialized, always votes, and appreciates the need for learning to live together, if he is ignorant, he is a poor citizen.

If he has not learned much subject matter in his schooling, he will add little or nothing to our Nation's needs for trained manpower.

Therefore, we look to you, the science teachers, for much guidance.

You and I know that nature's laws and the inventions based upon them are not in themselves evil.

It is only the use which men make of these things that leads to constructive or destructive results.

In closing, I would leave with you a short quotation from "The Education of Henry Adams," which wisely asserts that "A teacher affects eternity; he can never tell where his influence stops."

Ladies and gentlemen, this is my salute to you, with the added hope that the years ahead will be marked by increased cooperation between nations in the development and utilization of atomic energy for peaceful purposes.

American Credo Stamp Series

OF

HON. CHARLES E. CHAMBERLAIN

OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 13, 1960

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. Speaker, on January 20, Postmaster General Arthur E. Summerfield launched the American credo stamp series designed to revitalize famous quotations from great American patriots.

The first of these new 4-cent stamps honors George Washington and carries the advice contained in his Farewell Address of 1796: "Observe good faith and justice toward all nations."

Postmaster General Summerfield's comments in dedicating this stamp deserve wide reading. Therefore, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the address of the Postmaster General:

ADDRESS BY THE HONORABLE ARTHUR E. SUMMERFIELD, POSTMASTER GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES, AMERICAN CREDO STAMP CEREMONY, MOUNT VERNON, VA., JANUARY 20, 1960

There could be no more appropriate place to dedicate the American credo stamp series than here on this hallowed ground of Mount Vernon.

Here lived the man whose creed became the guiding inspiration of every generation that has followed, most certainly including our own.

The lives of great Americans lie behind us; but the immortal principles they expressed in words stand vitally before us.

In these treasured words we find the shining ideals by which our Nation has grown and prospered in freedom. By these words are formed the great and timeless credos that light our way forward.

We need to keep them before us, to emphasize their spirit, and to offer to share their universal truth with all the people of the world.

It is with these thoughts in mind that we have created the series of American credo stamps, the first six of which will be released in the months ahead.

As we join with you to launch the first of them today, we are inspired by the magnitude of the purposes they may serve. No other special stamps have received such warm and wide acclaim.

Our distinguished Citizens' Advisory Committee began consideration of this series over 2 years ago. At that time, we asked 100 prominent Americans—leaders in public life, historians, presidents of State universities—to state their opinions.

We presented a list of 24 expressions by great Americans, and proposed that they rate them according to their own evaluations, and add any which they believed to be more meaningful.

We received an almost 100-percent response. All heartily endorsed the endeavor. And with their vote and suggestions, and our own judgment, we arrived at the six which are to inaugurate this series.

There was almost unanimous agreement as to the first. It is the admonition enunciated by George Washington in his Farewell Address to "Observe good faith and justice toward all nations."

As you will recall, President George Washington announced his unequivocable decision on September 19, 1796, to relinquish his high office when his second term ended in March the following year.

In a Farewell Address on this occasion, the vigorous but aging First Citizen culled from his long life a series of principles which, summarizing his deep "solicitude for your welfare" chartered the course for the then infant United States of America.

No document save the Constitution has been quoted more often in political debate and whether the arguments from it are used pro or con in the heat of political controversy, Washington's Farewell Address is rightfully regarded as one of the most significant political testaments ever made.

Of all the national policies advocated by our first President in the farewell document, the precept "Observe good faith and justice toward all nations" is without question the most abiding.

We hope it can be said that over the course of 170 years, we have followed this counsel devotedly. It has been our guiding light; and today, it is the very essence of our international policy and desire.

Some may say that this ideal is easily and completely applicable as far as the free world is concerned. But what about the ideologies that are hostile to our very way of life? What about those who strive for world domination?

What, in short, about the Soviet Union and Communist China?

The counsel of Washington still applies, as surely as it did to the tyrannies of his day.

We can only hope for good faith in others as we demonstrate it ourselves. We must assume that the leaders of the Soviet Union, of Communist China, and other totalitarian regimes will eventually understand justice the better if justice prevails as the overwhelming world force of their time.

Let us observe good faith toward all nations, including those whose motives we dare not, at this juncture, fully trust. Let us impress upon their peoples the clear fact that we are as dedicated to freedom for all mankind as our fathers were in those fateful years when General Washington and his tattered legions fought to establish liberty as man's God-given right.

In practicing good faith, we must of course be prepared against bad faith at the same time.

As President Eisenhower expressed it so clearly in his recent state of the Union message: "Neither we nor any other free world nation can permit ourselves to be misled by pleasant promises until they are tested by performance."

And until this test is conclusive, we must follow the further wise advice of our first President, in his view that: "To be prepared for war is the most effectual means of preserving the peace."

We should not forget, either, the extent to which Washington gave of himself to insure that the precepts set forth in his Farewell Address would be realized.

Let us not forget that Washington and the men around him, not only his fellow Americans, but supporters from other countries like Lafayette, Kosciusko, Von Steuben risked everything, including life, in the cause for freedom.

George Washington was a wealthy planter, with a life of ease and comfort before him, if he so chose, when the call to duty came.

He accepted that call without hesitation. He suffered with his troops at Valley Forge. He endured all manner of hardship, even including the attacks of some of his own short-sighted countrymen.

And while he was leading the way in costly war and turbulent peace, he cast much of his own fortune into the struggle, never to be recovered.

His later years, here at Mount Vernon, were shadowed by debt and economic problems—a sharp contrast to his earlier life.

Thus George Washington set the challenge for us to meet today. It is for us to pledge ourselves to serve wholeheartedly, and to sacrifice as need be, in the preservation of the incomparable heritage we enjoy.

May this postage stamp carry our message of American hope, trust, and purpose throughout the world. May this stamp, as it expresses this great and noble ideal in 120 million printings, be a force of historic value in our own unity as a people; in the advancement of good will and understanding between ourselves and the peoples of today's closely knit world.

Other great Americans whose credos will be illuminated by these American credo stamps include: Thomas Jefferson, Benjamin Franklin, Patrick Henry, Francis Scott Key, and Abraham Lincoln.

We hope that each of these stamps, so beautifully designed by the noted artist, Frank Conley, will provide a means and an occasion for schools and patriotic and civic groups to commemorate these credos as they apply today.

Let me say that the Post Office Department will be happy to cooperate to the fullest extent possible in all activities so designed.

We believe that, in this undertaking, there is the basis for great good to be accomplished beyond the reach of the stamps themselves.

The ideals of liberty, courage, and faith were never more vital. All that we can do to implant them, as individuals, and as educators and public leaders, will be critically important to our future.

It is in this solemn spirit that we here dedicate this series of American credo stamps and wish them Godspeed in bearing their messages not only throughout our country, but to the people who would observe good faith and justice in all parts of the earth.

The New York Times in its "Topics" column on its editorial page of January 20, 1960, made some apt observations about the significance of this new stamp. This news comment reads as follows:

TOPICS

INAUGURATION IN AN OFF YEAR

If 1960 were an inauguration year instead of an election year, someone would be taking the oath of office as President of the United States today. Whoever that someone may be, next year he will be only the fourth man to be inaugurated on this date; Franklin Delano Roosevelt became the first when he entered his second term in 1937, but all of the 30 men who preceded him in office during nearly a century and a half took the oath on March 4. This year January 20 has been chosen for a different kind of inauguration. Today at Mount Vernon, Va., the post office is issuing a new kind of postage stamp inscribed with eight words over the facsimile signature of "G. Washington."

POSTAGE STAMP CREDO

There is nothing new or unusual about the size of this stamp; it represents 4 cents' worth of postal service paid for in advance and has adhesive on the back for the usual purpose. However, instead of a portrait or a pictorial design, the eight words from Washington are set in a border of decorative panels printed in red and blue on white paper. This is the first in a projected series of stamps announced last September and planned to give prominence to wise words of Founding Fathers and later statesmen. The general idea is that as the series continues these periodic phrases from the past will form a kind of progressive creed for Americans. To affirm this each stamp will carry the word "Credo" in one of the border panels, and quotations selected will embody a basic principle of national policy.

WISE WORDS NEVER SPOKEN

The words selected from Washington are the antithesis of anything to do with inauguration, coming as they do from his last utterance as Chief Executive rather than from his first. The admonition with which this new patriotic creed opens today is "Observance of good faith and justice toward all nations," the opening words of a paragraph midway in the Farewell Address composed by Washington, with help from Alexander Hamilton, over a period of 3 or 4 years and finally corrected by Washington for printing in the Philadelphia Daily Advertiser in September 1796. He dated the manuscript pointedly without designating his office or even the city in which he completed the document, but simply wrote "United States." Although it is entitled an address as is always so cited, there is no record that Washington ever delivered it orally. It must not, of course, be confused with his Farewell Address to his officers at Fraunces Tavern at Broad and Great Dock (now Pearl) Street on December 4, 1783, an occasion marked chiefly by good food, few words, and strong emotions carefully suppressed among fellow officers "gentlemen of the old school."

FAITH, JUSTICE, PEACE

Washington's admonition to "observe good faith and justice" toward other nations is followed in the original document by the words "cultivate peace and harmony with all." It is this passage in the address that contains his sound and thoughtful advice against too much love or too much hate for any other nation. Writers and speakers seeking to discourage close ties with foreign governments by this country have drawn upon it heavily. Often they associate with it the well-known phrase about avoiding "entangling alliances" which is not Washington's but Thomas Jefferson's expression and may be found in his First Inaugural Address, March 4, 1801. The whole tenor of Washington's thought on this point is to preserve a dignified, friendly balance between close attachment and strained relations; this course, he believed, would be especially wise for a small, new nation trying its way in the world.

WISDOM IN BRIEF

In the context of news at the opening of 1960 with high-level state visits behind us and before us and with summit meetings scheduled, few brief sentences could be selected which might describe more concisely the posture of this country on the world stage. As the serial parts of the new thumbnail-sized creed appear in wisdom and brevity through an election year, one may hope that statesmen now living, especially those ambitious to serve their fellow citizens in elective offices, might take the hint and recognize that words which live after a great man are often more admirable and memorable when found in such small gems as these.

Samuel M. Cohn, of Altoona, Pa., Honored for His Outstanding Service by the Associated Petroleum Industries of Pennsylvania

OF

HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 13, 1960

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, as a part of the petroleum industry's nationwide observance of the centennial year of the oil industry a banquet was held at Altoona, Pa., November 4, 1959, by the Associated Petroleum Industries of Pennsylvania.

During the course of the evening's program it was my privilege to deliver the principal address and to participate in the presentation of a plaque to Mr. Samuel M. Cohn, president of the Independent Oil Co. of Altoona, honoring him for his many years of outstanding service.

It has been my good fortune to know Sam Cohn and his family for many years and I regarded it as a special privilege to be selected as the principal speaker on such a joyous occasion.

Prominent officials of the oil industry in Pennsylvania journeyed to Altoona to pay tribute to Sam Cohn, not only for his many fine qualities but for the worthwhile contributions he has made over the years as an aid in the progress of the petroleum industry. In addition Sam was warmly commended for his interest in civic affairs and for his humanitarian efforts as one of the founders of the Kiwanis Health Farm—a project in which he has devoted much time and effort.

As a further and well-deserved tribute to my good friend Sam Cohn, I wish to include at this point in my remarks a copy of the fine editorial that appeared in the November 6, 1959, issue of the Altoona (Pa.) Mirror, together with a copy of my address.

The editorial and address follows:

[From the Altoona (Pa.) Mirror, Nov. 6, 1959]

CITED BY INDUSTRY

Samuel M. Cohn, of Altoona, who is more widely known as Sam Cohn, was most deservedly honored this week at a complete surprise tendered by State and area petroleum industries representatives. At the Altoona celebration, marking the 100th year of the industry, the Altoonan was presented a plaque for outstanding service.

Mr. Cohn was designated as "outstanding man of the central Pennsylvania area" in a program sponsored by the Associated Petroleum Industries of Pennsylvania, Dayton P. Clark and W. F. Richardson, State officers, being on hand to honor the Altoonan.

Presentation of the handsome plaque was made by Congressman JAMES E. VAN ZANDT, who delivered the address of the evening to a gathering of oil industries officials from central State counties.

The honored guest was lauded as a "product of the grassroots and a graduate of the school of hard knocks." His name is synonymous with the industry in this area, and with his brothers he has carried on the oil business launched by his father. He is a pioneer in this area.

"Sam is truly a self-made man," stated Congressman VAN ZANDT as he lauded the city leader. "He is symbolic of the industry. As president of the Independent Oil Co., he is never too busy to play his part in the community as a leader in club, bank, and hospital board activity and in promotions for the city betterment. He is one of the founders of the Kiwanis Health Farm. He comes from sturdy stock. He is friendly to all. Tonight we honor not only him, but his loved ones, his family, and his associates," concluded the speaker in his tribute and presentation.

The commendation was entirely unexpected, and Mr. Cohn was really surprised as he was greeted by his friends and industry leaders of many years' standing.

Altoonans also heartily congratulate Sam Cohn and laud his activities, also thanking the industry in this State for bestowing the fine honor on one of its sons and leaders.

SPEECH BY REPRESENTATIVE JAMES E. VAN ZANDT, MEMBER OF CONGRESS, 20TH DISTRICT OF PENNSYLVANIA, AT THE OBSERVANCE OF THE CENTENNIAL YEAR OF THE OIL INDUSTRY BY THE ASSOCIATED PETROLEUM INDUSTRIES OF PENNSYLVANIA, NOVEMBER 4, 1959, ALTOONA, PA.

It is a pleasure to accept the invitation of the Associated Petroleum Industries of Pennsylvania and to join you in this observance of the centennial year of the oil industry.

This year the air has been filled with events celebrating 100 years of progress in America's most revolutionary of all industries, the oil industry.

Along with the excitement of this centennial comes the opportunity for quiet reflection upon the many ways this invaluable product has affected our lives.

Surely such reflection brings an added awareness of how lucky we, in the United States, are to have been able to reap the many benefits of abundant supplies of oil.

So important and versatile is this exciting product in itself, that sometimes we overlook the fact that it was the mind of man that enabled us to discover and extract petroleum, and that it is the mind of man that discovered and continues to discover ever-new uses for it.

For the story of oil is the story of genius, ingenuity, daring, determination, and unbridled initiative.

These are the qualities that made this industry great, and this is what I wish to talk about this evening.

However, before we give modern man all the credit for making use of oil, we ought to look a little further back than the mere 100 years we are emphasizing in A.D. 1959.

Oil was to make its imprint upon history and our lives several thousand years earlier.

Noah used pitch, which was the abundant and widely distributed "rock oil" in making his ark.

Again we might ask the question: "Where would we be now if it weren't for oil?"

Pitch served as a mortar in building the Tower of Babel.

Moses' mother used it to coat the "Ark of Bulrushes" that carried her son down the River Nile to the Egyptian princess.

Nebuchadnezzar used asphalt to pave his roads and to build his palace in sixth century B.C. Babylonia.

In the ancient land of Sumer, a physician gave his patient a "petroleum prescription" for healing a sore, which was made of asphalt kneaded to form a salve.

A myriad of both major and minor uses of the substance that men found seeping to the surface of the earth reveals that petroleum had penetrated deeply into the economic life of the ancient countries of the Middle East.

The ancients had two uses for oil that have not found their way into modern life.

A law in Assyria stated that delinquents must submit to having molten bitumen poured over their heads as punishment for their crimes, and it was used in magic as a means of keeping out the evil spirits.

However, if keeping out evil spirits could be dressed up and given a more sophisticated interpretation, it would apply equally well today.

If evil spirits could be equated with economic stagnation, depression, and poverty, the oil industry could then truly be said to have kept them out of the United States.

One of the first Americans whose enlightened curiosity and penetrating insight led him to the conclusion that the material he saw bubbling from the earth might be of value was George Washington.

In 1753, over 100 years before Drake's successful drilling, Washington was visiting western Pennsylvania and saw the oil springs.

He felt that they must have some industrial importance and acquired some land on which there was a "burning spring."

He listed this in his will as his most valuable holding.

The world waited another century to see this vision realized.

It was actually a citizen of Titusville that supplied the initial momentum to the events leading to the first commercial oil well, aptly called "the hole that changed the world."

Dr. Francis B. Brewer, a physician, was convinced that the curative properties of petroleum were truly remarkable and declared that as long as he continued in his profession, he would keep it in constant use.

He gave a bottled sample to his uncle, a professor at Dartmouth.

It was at Dartmouth that it was seen by a young New York lawyer, George H. Bissell.

Bissell was supposed to have immediately seen the similarity between coal oil and petroleum and deduced that petroleum might be exploited as an illuminant.

He was further encouraged by a chemist, Benjamin Silliman, Jr., whose report predicted that "rock oil" had many uses and a great commercial future.

This opinion added stimulus to efforts to finance a project to extract petroleum in large quantities.

Such a story is typical of the important discoveries and developments of our country—flashes of intuitive insight backed up by determined efforts to see the idea carried to a successful conclusion.

And so the story of the first well continues along the same lines.

It was such a flash of inspiration that prompted Edwin L. Drake to bore, rather than dig, for oil.

After the insight occurred, Drake undertook the rest of the project with methodical and deliberate determination.

These were the qualities that allowed Drake to back up his theory that petroleum could be drilled for and obtained in substantial quantities.

An accomplishment such as this removed the major barrier to the development of this new industry.

Fortunately for the destiny of the product, there was an already pressing need for an ingredient to replace whale oil when the first oil started flowing from Drake's well—some 20 barrels a day.

Whale oil was the best lighting fuel of the day, but it was growing scarce and becoming expensive.

So while whaling captains were searching for Moby Dicks, less practical men were drilling for the material that was to replace the product of such adventures.

Others were developing new refining techniques to improve the process of the production of kerosene, such as the invention of Luther Atwood for the development of a process of "cracking" crude oil in 1860 which made the mass production of oil for illumination economically feasible, and the subsequent improvement by William M. Burton in 1913.

Not all the inventions, however, could be counted on to aid the petroleum industry, and when Thomas Edison perfected the incandescent electric lamp in 1879, kerosene began to be replaced as the main form of artificial illumination.

After all, we do have to give some other industries a break, too.

But rather than viewing this use of electricity as a setback to the industry, the inventive spirit of the Americans was employed to develop new uses for this versatile substance.

In 1870 asphalt was first used as a paving material in the United States.

It was the material which paved the street in front of city hall in Newark, N.J.

In 1879 George B. Selden applied for a patent on an automobile driven by an internal combustion engine and in 1893 Charles E. Duryea manufactured the "horseless buggy."

The year 1900 saw the first automobile show, and 3 years later the first cross-country automobile trip was made.

When, in 1909, Henry Ford had standardized his model T and announced that he would "make a motor car for the multitude," the gasoline market was off to a roaring start—and the following decade was appropriately named "the roaring twenties."

By 1924 Ford got his price for a model T down to $265, and secondhand cars could be found for as little as $25.

American initiative and enterprise were also leading to another great development which was ultimately to require large amounts of fuel from the petroleum industry.

The Wright brothers made the first successful flight at Kitty Hawk, N.C., in 1903, and Lindbergh flew from New York to Paris in 1927.

Without oil, the Wright brothers might still be trying to get off the ground.

Thus, the history of the oil industry itself and those industries dependent on oil is replete with examples of the outstanding progress made possible by the environment of the age, with its emphasis on individualism and initiative.

Oil first gave us something to read by, then something to grease our wheels and equipment with, and something smooth to ride on.

As a fuel for vehicles and machines, it has formed the basis for the vast mechanization that changed the entire way of life of our country.

The transportation industry, with its trucks, diesel locomotives, airplanes, was revolutionized by oil.

And finally, the petrochemical industry, with its multitude of beautiful and useful products, has modernized our homes, offices, clothing, and has even made its contribution to the beautification of the fair sex in the production of cosmetics.

Every facet of American life has been touched and touched again by the magic of oil.

In a quite different way, oil is touching the lives of almost every country—especially those same lands that put it to use in ancient times.

In the Middle Eastern country of Saudi Arabia, it is almost the sole source of income; in Iraq it is by far the most important one; and the surrounding Arab lands are directly affected by pipeline or canal transport.

Oil is giving our Latin American neighbor, Venezuela, the opportunity to prosper.

This resource is so vital to these lands that any changes in American oil policy will of necessity have serious, and possibly worldwide, repercussions.

Two and one-half years ago the world held its breath when a chain of events led to the Suez crisis.

Last year, Vice President NIXON held his breath when angry mobs shouted and threw stones at him in Venezuela.

These countries are too impatient to wait for the evolutionary developments that characterized the rise of the industry in this country.

Of such overriding importance is this one material, that oil, which has given mankind such great benefits, has come dangerously close to plunging the world into war.

This new and uncomfortable role for petroleum presents a challenge to the men in the industry, as well as to the policymakers in Washington.

The mind of man that so brilliantly developed new means of producing and using this material is now faced with this crucial problem—a problem that the industry itself has given rise to.

So far the oilmen have done a most credible job in their international dealings—perhaps the Washington policymakers could learn a few lessons from their public relations policies throughout the world.

The problems oil poses in the field of international relations are of the most serious and urgent nature.

These are questions that the oilman is not asked to solve by himself.

In many cases, decisions made in Washington that affect him directly are entirely out of his hands.

I don't believe that it is unfair to speculate on the course history would have taken had the views of the representatives of the oil industry been considered in the relations of the United States with the oil-producing countries of the world.

I am sure such events as the Suez crisis, that threatened the peace of the world, would have been avoided.

Our brief review would not be complete if we didn't mention just one more role that oil has played in the history of the world—that is its role in warfare and in national defense.

Oil was the lifeblood of the mechanized Army, the Navy, and the Air Force.

Without oil, the machineries producing the materials of war would have come to a grinding halt; the arms and heavy equipment and artillery would have been rendered useless; and all means of transportation—the airplanes, ships, motorized vehicles, would have been helplessly relegated to idleness.

Even the supermodern atomic and hydrogen weapons are dependent upon means of delivery fueled by oil.

Ballistic missiles will employ other types of fuel, but as long as the debates continue on the possibility of limited or total wars, the weapons and aircraft using oil will continue to be produced.

Turning back to the domestic scene to review the history of the development of the oil industry, with its emphasis on individual daring and determination, leads us to speculate upon the future course the industry will take.

Estimates for the next decade all indicate that the Nation's consumption of energy of all kinds will increase at least 50 percent.

The Chase Manhattan Bank, in its studies of the petroleum industry estimates that domestic petroleum consumption will increase from the almost 20 million barrels a day in 1957 to around 30 million in 1967.

They estimate that oil will capture 48 percent of the Nation's energy market.

So the oil industry, as large as it looms in relation to the other industries in the country, is destined to get bigger and better.

I can still say "better," although I realize that it is inevitable that much of the color and the rugged individualism that was so typical of the early development will be subdued.

In an environment where many factors are at work to make the individual seek security rather than adventure, where the opportunities seem to lie in working for someone else rather than in the attempt to strike out on your own, it naturally follows that this industry, too, will wear a more conservative cloak.

I am sure that many of you here have witnessed this change and have felt its effects.

Perhaps you have wondered, along with many of us in other fields, if this attitude will retard the future technical and economic progress that the oil industry has contributed to the growth of the United States.

The answer is emphatically "No," because as long as the oil industry continues to produce leaders like our own Sam Cohn of Altoona the future is in safe hands.

It is fitting and proper that you have decided on this occasion to tender a well-deserved tribute to Sam Cohn.

You are to be highly commended for selecting Sam as the outstanding oilman of the central Pennsylvania area because he is a symbol of the success that can be achieved by honest and persevering efforts.

Very few in this room know Sam Cohn as well as your speaker does.

We grew up together in this city of Altoona.

To let you in on a little personal side of Sam's life we really got acquainted when Sam visited my neighborhood while courting his wife.

He is truly a product of the grassroots and a graduate of the "school of hard knocks."

Along with his father and brothers, Sam is a pioneer of the oil industry.

Today when you discuss oil in the Altoona area the name of Sam Cohn is symbolic of the progress and place oil occupies in the American way of life.

Always a "busy bee," Sam applies himself daily to his task as president of the Independent Oil Co.; yet he is never too busy to play his part as a community leader whether it be as a director of the bank, a member of the board of hospital trustees, or the president of the Altoona Kiwanis Club.

As an indication of the great interest he has in the underprivileged, it was during his presidency of the Kiwanis Club in 1928 that the Kiwanis Health Farm for Children was established in Scotch Valley.

Sam is truly a self-made man, that type of an American which has made our Nation what it is today.

So many times we forget to acknowledge the ones who have played an important part in the lives of those fellow citizens whom we honor.

Therefore, let me mention the sturdy stock represented by Sam Cohn's father and mother and the guidance they gave him.

Then, too, there is another person—Sam's good wife Margaret Mattas Cohn.

"Mag" as we knew her in her girlhood days has played the part as an ideal wife and her inspiration has played a great part in the success Sam has achieved.

Therefore, tonight as we present to our honored guest, Sam Cohn, a scroll as the outstanding oilman of the central Pennsylvania area we honor not only him but his loved ones and especially his wife, Margaret.

Before presenting the scroll to Sam let me emphasize that only in America can you find a product of the grassroots whose ingenuity, initiative, and perservance have elevated him to the high position he occupies in the business world.

Therefore, it is with great honor that I present this scroll on behalf of the Associated Petroleum Industries of Pennsylvania to a true American, an outstanding businessman, a community leader, your friend and my friend, Sam Cohn.

Government Lamb Grading

OF

HON. LEONARD G. WOLF

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 13, 1960

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, this week there have been committee hearings on the question of Government lamb grading. I would like to place in the REC-ORD at this point a letter which I wrote to the chairman of the House Agriculture Committee, the Honorable HAROLD D. COOLEY, and two letters which came to me from the State of Iowa, pointing out the necessity for continued Government grading of lamb.

The letters follow:

JANUARY 14, 1960.

Hon. HAROLD D. COOLEY,
Chairman, Committee on Agriculture, House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I had planned to submit a statement on my views concerning the need for Government lamb grading to be included in the hearings on this subject.

This morning, however, I received in the mail two letters which so eloquently state the case for the small packing plant, that I decided instead to submit these letters for inclusion in the printed hearings. I endorse wholeheartedly the position taken in the two letters which follow.

Sincerely yours,

LEONARD G. WOLF,
Representative in Congress.

SOMEWHERE IN IOWA,
January 12, 1960.

Congressman LEONARD WOLF,
U.S. House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. WOLF: One reason why there is so much controversy over lamb grading, and this I have seen, is when Swift & Co. (or any of the other large companies) kills a large bunch of lambs, their grader, not the Government grader, goes through the lambs first and puts "Swift's Premium" on all the best ones; then they want the Government grader to grade the second best "Choice" and naturally the Choice ones have already been picked out and branded with "Swift's Premium." Then they accuse the grader of not giving them the Choice grade and then tell the producer that the Government grader is too tough. When the Choice or Prime have been picked out, there is nothing left for the grader to work on except the inferior ones. This I have seen, but I could lose my job over this letter, so please don't use it publicly unless I have protection on it.

Sincerely,

———— ————.

SOMEWHERE IN IOWA,
January 12, 1960.

Congressman LEONARD WOLF,
U.S. House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. WOLF: I am writing to you relative to Mr. Benson's order to suspend grading of lambs as of February 6. I thought you would be interested in knowing that if this happens hundreds of small packers will go out of business. This I know for certain as it happened to us when we lost Government grading in our packinghouse. From 1945 until about 1954, we had Government grading. In 1954 or thereabouts new laws were put into effect making it mandatory that we spend at least $50,000 remodeling and enlarging our killing floor so that we could qualify for grading.

Since we did not have the necessary money we were unable to remodel and, consequently, lost our grading. Thereafter we were unable to sell our product at competitive prices as the butchers told us that they could not pay us as much for ungraded meat as they would for graded or highly advertised brands, as their customers wouldn't pay as much for an unknown quality. They further stated that they would just as soon buy our meat if it were graded as they would meat of a highly advertised brand, as people knew they were getting the same quality if it were Government graded. We felt that this law was caused to be put into effect by the big packers to eliminate competition. In our case it worked, as we had to get out of the packing business.

Now the big packers are trying to get the grading taken off lambs so they can in the same way eliminate competition. It seems to me if they do not want grading they should not object to others having it as it is strictly their own choice and the small packer pays for the service if he wants it and can discontinue it at any time. As you already know the grading service is entirely self-supporting and does not cost the taxpayer 1 cent.

Sincerely yours,

———— ————.

P.S.—Since World War II there has been lots of small packers that have started up because they have had a product equivalent to the large packer, mainly because they have had the U.S. standards to help them sell their products. In other words, they have had "U.S. Choice" or "U.S. Good."

Now if a large chainstore buyer had to buy a carload of lamb or beef and he called the packinghouse, whose name was, say, Jones, and said "What have you to offer?" the packer, if he has U.S. Choice or U.S. Good, can state that he has the certain grade at a certain price. But if he has no U.S. graded meat, he would have to say, "We have a load of Jones' Choice." Now, which do you think the big buyer would buy?—Jones' Choice, or Swift's Premium, or Armour's Star, or Wilson's Certified, or Morrel's Pride? These big packers are all nationally advertised and naturally the buyer would buy the nationally advertised brand. But when the small packer has Government grading, he has the same quality to sell as the others have because everyone knows the U.S. grades are the same in every packinghouse.

If the large packer doesn't want Government grading he can tell the Government he no longer wants it, as the grading doesn't cost him anything if he doesn't use it. But why take it away from hundreds of small packers, as the packer pays for the service if he wants it and it doesn't cost the taxpayer anything. There is just one answer. As long as the small packer has Government grading he is a threat to their business, and they are trying to eliminate him.

As I have stated before, we had to give up our business because we lost our U.S. grading, and we know this is happening to other small packers. Also, on the other side of the picture, when we had the packinghouse we killed a few mutton and lambs. A few market operators used to buy old mutton and advertise it in the paper as weekend specials, at cutrate prices, as genuine lamb. Most housewives do not know a lamb from a mutton unless it is so graded and marked.

SENATE

THURSDAY, JANUARY 14, 1960

(Legislative day of Wednesday, January 13, 1960)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D.D., offered the following prayer:

O God, who with Thy kindly light followest us all the way, we come conscious of the cloud of witnesses who look upon us as we face our tasks—those pioneers of the spirit who nobly fought in days long past, and who in times as baffling as ours refused to nurse their disappointments, to brood over their defeats, or to be browbeaten by their fears.

When it seems to us that our times are too perplexing and oppressive, and that evil casts too great a shadow over all our dreams for humanity, remind us that so it seemed to those who went before us, and that we can find—as they found—that the prayer for wisdom, for vision, and for courage is the prayer that never goes unanswered. We ask it in the dear Redeemer's name. Amen.

ATTENDANCE OF A SENATOR

WARREN G. MAGNUSON, a Senator from the State of Washington, appeared in his seat today.

STATEMENT BY SENATOR BYRD OF VIRGINIA

Civilian employment in the executive branch of the Federal Government increased 2,138 during the period July through November 1959. The total in July was 2,370,694. In November there were 2,372,832 civilian employees.

Employment by civilian agencies of the Federal Government showed a net increase of 23,655 during the period from July through November 1959, increasing from 1,292,732 in July to 1,316,387 in November. The November figure included 29,389 enumerators for the census of agriculture. Civilian employment in the Department of Defense decreased 21,517 during the same period, dropping from 1,077,962 in July to 1,056,445 in November.

In the Department of Defense white-collar employment decreased 16,114 from 563,821 in July to 547,707 in November, and industrial employment decreased 5,403 from 514,141 in July to 508,738 in November.

In June the Federal civilian payroll was running at an annual rate of $12,526 million and in October it was running at an annual rate of $12,606 million.

These figures summarize compilations of monthly personnel reports certified by executive agencies to the Joint Committee on Reduction of Nonessential Expenditures since Congress adjourned September 15, 1959.

In addition to this regularly reported civilian employment, there were foreign nationals working under U.S. military agencies overseas, excluded from usual personnel reporting, whose services are provided by contractual agreement between United States and foreign governments, or because of the nature of their work or the source of funds from which they are paid. These numbered 185,182 in July and 181,464 in November, a decrease of 3,718.

CONCURRENT RESOLUTIONS

NATIONAL JUNIOR ACHIEVEMENT WEEK

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, for the past several years I have submitted in the Senate, and the Congress has adopted, a concurrent resolution requesting the President to declare a week in late January or early February as National Junior Achievement Week. I am submitting a similar concurrent resolution today. Time is short between now and the week chosen by Junior Achievement, Inc., as the period for celebrating the efforts of the thousands of junior achievement companies in America.

It is my hope that the responsible committees of both Houses, and the Senate and House as well, can complete action on the concurrent resolution in time for the President to issue his proclamation declaring the week of January 31–February 6 as National Junior Achievement Week.

By this concurrent resolution, the Congress expresses its commendation of the work Junior Achievement is doing to help young people learn the skills and responsibilities that make up a free enterprise economy. I hope we may provide that commendation again this year.

Mr. President, I send the concurrent resolution to the desk for appropriate reference. I submit the resolution on behalf of myself and the very able and distinguished minority leader, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The concurrent resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 81) was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

Whereas it was the initiative, the sense of individual dignity, and the determination to mold their own futures that motivated those who founded this Nation; and

Whereas Junior Achievement, Incorporated, through its learning-by-doing program, is inculcating those ideals in American youth by helping them to set up and operate their own small-scale business enterprises; and

Whereas their experience in running Junior Achievement companies will provide these young people with a heightened understanding of the privileges and duties of citizenship and better prepare them to assume the responsibilities of community leadership; and

Whereas thousands of American businessmen voluntarily give unstintingly of their time, their counsel, and their expereince for the benefit of the members of Junior Achievement; and

Whereas it is understood that the week beginning January 31, 1960, and ending February 6, 1960, will be observed as National Junior Achievement Week: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President of the United States is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation designating the week of January 31, 1960, through February 6, 1960, as National Junior Achievement Week and urging all citizens of our country to salute the activities of Junior Achievers and their volunteer adult advisers through appropriate ceremonies.

EXTENSION OF JOINT COMMITTEE ON WASHINGTON METROPOLITAN PROBLEMS

Mr. BIBLE submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 82), which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Joint Committee on Washington Metropolitan Problems created by House Concurrent Resolution 172, agreed to August 29, 1957, is hereby continued through September 30, 1960.

SEC. 2. The Joint Committee is hereby authorized to make expenditures from February 1, 1960, through September 30, 1960, which shall not exceed $25,000 to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the joint committee.

RESOLUTIONS

INVESTIGATION OF CERTAIN MATTERS BY COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE

Mr. MAGNUSON submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 243), which was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized under sections 134(a) and 136 of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, as amended, and in accordance with its jurisdictions specified by rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate, to examine, investigate, and make a complete study of any and all matters pertaining to—

(1) interstate commerce generally;
(2) foreign commerce generally;
(3) maritime matters;
(4) interoceanic canals;
(5) transportation policy;
(6) domestic surface transportation, including pipelines;
(7) communications;
(8) Federal power matters;
(9) civil aeronautics; and
(10) fisheries and wildlife.

SEC. 2. For the purposes of this resolution the committee, from February 1, 1960, to January 31, 1961, inclusive, is authorized (1) to make such expenditures as it deems advisable; (2) to employ, upon a temporary basis, technical, clerical, and other assistants and consultants: Provided, That the minority is authorized to select one person for appointment, and the person so selected shall be appointed and his compensation shall be so fixed that his gross rate shall not be less by more than $1,200 than the highest gross rate paid to any other employee; and (3) with the prior consent of the heads of the departments or agencies concerned, and the Committee on Rules and Administration, to utilize the reimbursable services, information, facilities, and personnel of any of the departments or agencies of the Government.

SEC. 3. The committee shall report its findings, together with its recommendations for legislation as it deems advisable, to the Senate at the earliest practicable date, but not later than January 31, 1961.

SEC. 4. Expenses of the committee, under this resolution, which shall not exceed $, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

STUDY OF TRANSPORTATION POLICIES IN THE UNITED STATES

Mr. MAGNUSON submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 244), which was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

Whereas a sound national transportation system is essential to the continued economic development and defense of the United States; and

Whereas fair and equitable Federal policies are necessary to assure such a sound national transportation system; and

Whereas hearings held by the Surface Transportation Subcommittee of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce have disclosed there is urgent need for a comprehensive study of such transportation policy and related problems by the Congress, to the end that sound policies may be evolved: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized under sections 134(a) and 136 of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, as amended, and in accordance with its jurisdiction specified by rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate, to examine, investigate, and make a complete study of any and all matters pertaining to—

1. the need for regulation of transportation under present-day conditions and, if there is need for regulation, the type and character of that regulation;

2. the area of Federal policy dealing with Government assistance provided the various forms of transportation and the desirability of a system of user charges to be assessed against those using such facilities;

3. the subject of the ownership of one form of transportation by another;

4. Federal policy on the subject of consolidations and mergers in the transportation industry;

5. policy considerations for the kind and amount of railroad passenger service necessary to serve the public and provide for the national defense;

6. the problems arising from action by the Interstate Commerce Commission in permitting the charge of more for a short than a long transportation haul over the same line in the same direction;

7. the adequacy of transportation service to and from rural communities in the United States, and the effects of the curtailment of such service in recent years upon the economy of such communities and of the Nation as a whole and upon the national defense and security; and

8. additional matters of Federal regulation (and exemption therefrom) and Federal promotional policy in regard to the various forms of transportation.

SEC. 2. For the purposes of this resolution the committee, from February 1, 1960, to January 31, 1961, inclusive, is authorized (1) to make such expenditures as it deems advisable; (2) to employ on a temporary basis, technical, clerical, and other assistants and consultants: Provided, That the minority is authorized to select one person for appointment, and the person so selected shall be appointed and his compensation shall be so fixed that his gross rate shall not be less by more than $1,200 than the highest gross rate paid to any other employee; and (3) with the prior consent of the heads of the departments or agencies concerned, and the Committee on Rules and Administration, to utilize the reimbursable services, information, facilities, and personnel of any of the departments or agencies of the Government.

SEC. 3. The committee shall report its findings, together with its recommendations for legislation as it deems advisable, to the Senate at the earliest practicable date, but not later than January 31, 1961.

SEC. 4. Expenses of the committee, under this resolution, which shall not exceed $, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

ASSISTANCE TO SENATORS IN RECEPTION OF FOREIGN DIGNITARIES

Mr. FULBRIGHT, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported an original resolution (S. Res. 245) providing assistance to Members of the Senate in the discharge of their responsibilities in connection with visits to the United States by foreign dignitaries, and for other purposes, which resolution was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

LIBERALIZATION OF EXTRA EARNINGS ALLOWANCES UNDER SOCIAL SECURITY ACT

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to increase from $1,200 to $1,800 annually the allowable extra earnings for persons on social security.

The proposal would allow those who now are receiving modest benefits under social security to increase their extra earnings, in instances in which they are ready, willing, and able to work, and jobs are available.

Today, nearly 16 million persons in the country are over 65. Unfortunately, far too few of them have been able to lay away a nest egg for retirement. More than 14 million folks, including over 320,000 in Wisconsin, are receiving social security benefits—often at a very modest level—which have helped to "keep the wolf away from the door."

We recognize, of course, that it is often difficult for folks in their maturing years to find jobs—for which there is ever-greater competition these days.

Under circumstances in which jobs are available, however, I believe it is absolutely unrealistic to prevent these folks—who have helped to build this great country—from improving their standard of living and maintaining as great a degree of economic independence as possible.

To brighten the outlook for these senior citizens, I believe that the increase in allowable extra earnings—not only providing larger incomes, but also encouraging them to continue to contribute to community life—would be not only in their best interests, but also in the best interests of the country.

My colleagues will recall that I have introduced similar bills in previous sessions of Congress.

Recently, it was a real pleasure to note that the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare endorsed the principle of allowing increased earnings by those who are obtaining social security benefits.

I am hopeful, therefore, that Congress will take expeditious action to provide this much-needed improvement in our social security program. Overall, it would serve to brighten the outlook for a great many of our senior citizens.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 2809) to amend section 203 of the Social Security Act to increase the amount of earnings individuals are permitted to earn without suffering deductions from their benefits, introduced by Mr. WILEY, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

NATIONAL EMERGENCY LABOR DISPUTES ACT OF 1960

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN], I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to authorize the President in the event of a national emergency labor dispute to appoint a public factfinding board which would make recommendations for settlement. Following such action, the bill provides that where the national health and safety is involved the President may direct the Attorney General to go into court and request the appointment of a special receiver who would take possession of the affected facilities in the name of the United States and operate them to the extent required to protect the Nation's health or safety.

Under the terms of the bill, the President would invoke either the existing factfinding and injunction procedures of the Taft-Hartley Act, the new factfinding section in this legislation—which provides for a 30-day cooling off period following the issuance of the Board's recommendations—or a combination of both when labor disputes of a national emergency nature arise. When such means prove unsuccessful in achieving a settlement, the President may declare a national emergency to exist and direct the Attorney General to go to court to seek the appointment of a special receiver to operate the plant, mine, or other facility.

In fulfilling his function of operating the facility to the extent deemed necessary to protect national health and safety, the special receiver could utilize the facility's regular management and production personnel. During this period, the receiver would maintain existing wages, hours, and other conditions of employment. However, the court may direct that adjustments be made while the facility is in the Government's possession within the framework of recommendations which might have been made by the factfinding board. Ordinarily, the receiver would operate the facility for the account of the employer, unless the employer exercised the option to request compensation for the temporary use of his facility. In that case, the net proceeds of the operation would be turned over to the Government and the employer would exercise his right to receive just, fair and reasonable payment as rental, taking into account the effect the labor dispute had on the rental value of the facility involved.

The recent national steel dispute, lasting 173 days from the time the strike began until the settlement was finally announced, demonstrated with unmistakable clarity that our existing means of dealing with national emergency labor disputes are inadequate to cope with the necessities of life in modern America. Our research shows that since 1862 Congress has enacted 18 separate statutes which recognize the necessity for the Federal Government to take possession and to operate industrial and other facilities in order to meet special emergency needs. However, those four which remain on the books today have a very limited application.

We must devise new methods to deal with disputes which can so severely affect employment and production levels throughout the whole U.S. economy that they may precipitate a national crisis. The overriding national interest in such disputes is the paramount factor in any major struggle between opposing economic forces in any industry.

However, in the establishment of new methods to protect the national interest in such situations, we must strive to maintain and strengthen the traditional American means for settling disputes through the essential tool of collective bargaining. The imposition of a decision on both sides through compulsory arbitration, which has been suggested, seems to us to be undesirable since it tends to force the two parties in the dispute farther apart instead of bringing them closer to a mutually acceptable agreement.

Under our proposal, the National Emergency Labor Disputes Act of 1960, the terms of final settlement are completely within the bargaining power of both parties, and neither can gain from refusing to bargain in good faith since any adjustments involving the employees made by the special receiver are only in force for the period during which he is in possession of the plant for the Federal Government. Possession of the plant or other facilities is not restored to the employer until labor-management relations compatible with the national health and safety are established.

This proposed legislation adapts a technique of the Railway Labor Act which was originally used with considerable success—it is that which provides for the drawing up and releasing of recommendations by a public factfinding board in a labor dispute and, following their public issuance, the commencement of a 30-day "cooling off" period during which negotiations continue. Also, the State of Massachusetts reports that it has found most effective a State law which authorizes the Governor to take possession of facilities where an immediate interruption of services threatens public health and safety. From 1948 through 1953, the Governor announced on six separate occasions that he would invoke the law and move to have the State take possession of the affected facility. However, in three of those instances a voluntary agreement to continue operations, pending settlement of the dispute, was reached shortly after the Governor announced his intention. In the three other cases, a settlement was reached through collective bargaining while the State government was operating the facility.

The measurable loss to our economy during the steel strike was staggering. Our gross national product, which was expected to rise under normal circumstances by some $13 billion from July 1 through September 30, 1959, decreased instead by some $6 billion. The U.S. Treasury estimates that its tax loss from all sources as a result of the steel strike was about $710 million. Another $3.3 billion was lost in steel sales, and about $632 million was lost in terms of overhead, depreciation, and other steel wages.

The total amount of money lost to steelworkers was $1.1 billion, while each striking steelworker suffered an average loss of $2,200.

Although other major industries involved in trade, commerce, transportation, and communication may not approach the steel industry as to total employees—some 500,000—the economic impact of a prolonged interruption in their functioning could prove devastating. At least, there was some forewarning in the steel industry and an effort was made to stockpile steel in advance of the strike deadline. However, it is impossible to "stockpile" indispensable services, such as those performed by hospital workers, by manufacturers and distributors of perishable commodities, by public utilities, and by those working on most modern weapons where a stoppage could endanger national security. It is with these considerations uppermost in mind that we are today introducing national emergency labor dispute legislation.

The Communist bloc, under the leadership of the Soviet Union, has challenged the political and economic institutions of the free world under the leadership of the United States to a life-and-death struggle which may well be waged for decades to come. Our system of private enterprise is being put to its supreme test, and it is therefore in the self-interest of U.S. management and labor that the process of free, collective bargaining which has so vitalized our industrial capacity be utilized to the fullest extent possible, commensurate with the national interest.

Mr. President, in support of the bill, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD together with a study prepared by the Legislative Reference Service on the operations of the Steel Industry Fact-Finding Board of 1949, which suggested amendment of the law to permit recommendations to be made; a legal memorandum prepared by William H. Davis, a New York lawyer, former chairman of the National Defense Mediation Board and the War Labor Board during World War II, and finally, a list and analysis of the previous seizure statutes prepared by Justice Felix Frankfurter in connection with the steel seizure decision of 1951.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill, study, memorandum, and analysis will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 2810) amending the National Labor Relations Act with respect to emergency labor disputes, introduced by Mr. JAVITS (for himself and Mr. AIKEN), was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The study, memorandum, and analysis presented by Mr. JAVITS are as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "National Emergency Labor Disputes Act of 1960".

SEC. 2. The National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is hereby further amended as follows:

(a) By adding immediately following section 205 the following new section:

"PUBLIC FACTFINDING BOARDS

"SEC. 205A. Whenever in the opinion of the President, a threatened or actual strike or lockout affecting an entire industry or a substantial part thereof engaged in trade, commerce, transportation, transmission, or communication among the several states or with foreign nations, or engaged in the production of goods for commerce will, if permitted to occur or continue, imperil the national health, safety, or welfare, and the settlement of such dispute through collective bargaining will be assisted by such action, the President may appoint a public fact finding board to inquire into the facts with respect to such dispute and, if the President so direct at the time of appointment of the board or thereafter, to make such recommendations to the parties as to the settlement of the dispute between them as it may deem appropriate. The provisions of section 207 of this Act shall be applicable to the appointment, powers, and compensation of such board. Within thirty days from the creation of such a board it shall make a written report to the President, which shall include a statement of the facts with respect to the dispute, including each party's statement of its position, and if the President has so directed, recommendations to the parties for the settlement of the dispute between them. The President shall file a copy of such report with the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and the Service, and shall make its contents available to the public. Neither party shall be under a duty to accept in whole or in part any recommendation of settlement made by the board. After the creation of such board and for thirty days after such board has made its report to the President, no change except by agreement shall be made by the parties to the controversy in the conditions out of which the dispute arose."

"SEC. 210A. Whenever the President finds with respect to a threatened or actual strike or lockout affecting an entire industry or a substantial part thereof engaged in trade, commerce, transportation, transmission or communication among the several States or with foreign nations, or engaged in the production of goods for commerce, after (a) he has invoked the provisions of section 205A or sections 206 through 210 withut settlement of the dispute thereunder, or (b) he has determined that the procedures under the provisions of section 205A or sections 206 through 210 are not applicable to such dispute, that the exercise of the powers and authority provided by this section are necessary to preserve and protect the national health or safety, he is authorized to declare a national emergency relative thereto by Executive order and to direct the Attorney General to petition any district court of the United States having jurisdiction of the employer, for the appointment of a special receiver to take immediate possession in the name of the United States of any plant, mine, or other facility which is the subject of such labor dispute and to use and operate such plant, mine, or other facility in the interests of the United States, and if the court finds that the exercise of the power and authority provided by this section is necessary to preserve and protect the national health or safety, it shall have jurisdiction to appoint such a special receiver and to make such other orders as may be appropriate: Provided, however, That (1) such plant, mine, or other facility shall be operated by the special receiver only to the extent which in the opinion of the court is necessary to protect the national health and safety of the United States or of any material portion of the population or territory thereof; (2) the possession and operation of such plant, mine, or other facility shall not render inapplicable any State or Federal law concerning health, safety, security, or employment standards and the special receiver while operating such facility shall comply with such laws as if it were privately operated; (3) the wages, hours, conditions, and other terms of employment effective at the time of taking possession by the special receiver shall be maintained without change: Provided, That the court may, if a public factfinding board appointed under section 205A shall have recommended changes in rates of pay, wages, hours, or other conditions of employment, direct the special receiver to make such recommendations effective in whole or in part in any plant, mine, or other facility which is being operated by the special receiver during such period of operation: And provided further, That if no such board shall have been appointed, the President may in his discretion appoint a special board which shall be subject to the provisions of section 207 of this Act and shall make such recommendations concerning changes in rates of pay, wages, hours, and other conditions of employment for the period of operation by the special receiver as it may deem appropriate and which the court may direct the special receiver to make effective in whole or in part in any plant, mine, or other facility which is being operated by the special receiver during such period of operation; (4) such plant, mine, or other facility shall be returned to the employer as soon as practicable, but in no event later than thirty days after the restoration of such labor relations in such plant, mine, or other facility that the possession or operation thereof by the special receiver is no longer necessary to insure the operation thereof required for the protection and preservation of the national health and safety; (5) such plant, mine, or other facility shall be operated by the special receiver for the account of the employer: Provided further, That the employer shall have the right to elect, by written notice filed with the court within ten days of such taking of possession, to waive all claims to the proceeds of such operation and to receive in lieu thereof just, fair, and reasonable compensation for the period of such possession and operation by the special receiver, to be paid by the United States as follows: (A) The President shall ascertain the amount of just, fair, and reasonable compensation to be paid as rental for the appropriation and temporary use of such plant, mine, or other facility while in the possession of or operated by the special receiver in the interest of the United States, such determination to be made as of the time of the taking hereunder, and taking into account the existence of the labor dispute which interrupted or threatened to interrupt the operation of such plant, mine, or other facility and the effect of such interruption or threatened interruption upon the value to the employer of the use of such plant, mine, or other facility; (B) If the amount so ascertained is not acceptable to the employer as just, fair, and reasonable compensation for the appropriation and temporary use of the property taken hereunder and as full and complete compensation therefor, the employer shall be paid 75 per centum of such amount and shall be entitled to sue the United States in the Court of Claims or in any district court of the United States in the manner provided for by sections 1357 and 1491 of title 28 of the United States Code to recover such further sums as when added to the amount so paid shall make such amount as will be just, fair, and reasonable compensation for the appropriation and temporary use of the property so taken. In the event such notice of election is filed with the court, the special receiver shall pay over to the United States the proceeds of the operations of such plant, mine, or other facility while in his possession."

THE 1949 STEEL LABOR DISPUTE AND THE PRESIDENT'S STEEL INDUSTRY FACTFINDING BOARD

(By Vladimir N. Pregelj, Economics Division, Library of Congress, December 1, 1959)

BACKGROUND OF THE DISPUTE

In early May 1949, the wage-policy committee and the executive board of the United Steelworkers of America (CIO) formulated demands to be presented to the steel companies under reopening clauses, added in 1948 as amendments to the 1947 contracts. The 1948 supplemental agreement provided that "60 days prior to July 16, 1949, either party may serve notice on the other of its desire to negotiate: (a) for a general and uniform change in rates of pay and/or (b) for life, accident, health, medical, and hospital insurance benefits."

On May 16, 1949, the union served notices on the various companies of its desire to negotiate both a change in wages and insurance benefits mentioned in the 1948 amendment. In addition, the union, in separate letters, also indicated that it desired to negotiate on the subject of pensions.

Collective-bargaining conferences began on June 15, 1949, in Pittsburgh. Steel companies refused to grant a wage increase, and, with the exception of Inland Steel, also rejected the demand for negotiating a pension plan on the grounds that such a proposal was not bargainable under the reopening clauses of the 1948 amendment. In the matter of social insurance, however, several companies made counterproposals. In view of the position held by the companies and the equally adamant demands for larger benefits presented by the union, there was virtually no progress made in the collective-bargaining sessions during the 3 weeks from the opening of negotiations till July 7.

In view of the deadlock, Cyrus S. Ching, Director of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service, on July 7, 1949, invited the representatives of both sides to meet with him in Washington on July 11. Both joint and separate conferences were held on July 11, but no headway was made as both parties to the dispute held fast in their original positions. With the failure of conciliation efforts and prospect of work stoppage as of July 15, 1949, Mr. Ching, on July 12, reported the dispute to the President, and suggested that he request a 75-day maintaining of the status quo and appoint a three-member board to investigate the issues in dispute and to make recommendations for its settlement.

CREATION AND ACTIVITIES OF THE STEEL INDUSTRY BOARD

As suggesed by Mr. Ching, President Truman, on July 12, 1949, sent a telegram to the union and six major steel companies, requesting that, in view of its vital role in the national economy, the steel industry continue operating under the terms of existing contracts for a period of an additional 60 days. Mr. Truman also stated that he would appoint a three-member factfinding board to investigate the issues and submit a report with recommendations for the settlement within 45 days from July 16.

The President's request was immediately accepted by the union. The companies, however, showed considerable reluctance to agree to such procedure. The United States Steel Corp. contended that Presidential intervention, if necessary at all, should have been within the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act, authorizing the creation of a factfinding board without the power to make recommendations. On behalf of the President, Mr. Ching replied to the United States Steel Corp. and requested a definite reply as to the acceptance of the President's proposal. He also stated that "experience under the Labor Management Relations Act has demonstrated that factfinding in major disputes without recommendations usually results in delay but does not promote settlement." He added that the President's proposal was made with the objective in mind of the great help which recommendations suggested by factfinding boards can offer toward the settlement of disputes. On July 15, 1949, the United States Steel Corp. consented to the President's proposal. It stated, however, that it would not consider itself bound by findings or recommendations issuing from such a board. Similar reservations were contained and problems of individual companies requiring special consideration were pointed out in replies made by other steel companies.

The Steel Industry Board was formally established on July 15, 1949. Its members were: Carroll R. Daugherty, professor of business economics at Northwestern University, chairman; Samuel I. Rosenman, former New York Supreme Court justice; and David L. Cole, attorney, of Paterson, N.J.

The Board conducted its hearings in New York. At the first meeting, on July 26, 1949, procedural matters were discussed, and hearings on substantive issues began on July 28 with union's testimony. Initially, 8 days of testifying were allowed to either side in the dispute; these periods were subsequently extended slightly and two recesses were granted to allow further testimony by the companies.

During the presentation of its case, the union estimated that the total increase in cost of its demands would be equivalent to 30 cents an hour, divided as follows: 12.5 cents in wages, 11.23 cents to establish a $125 monthly retirement benefits fund for workers over 65 years of age, and 6.27 cents for a noncontributory (company-paid) life and health insurance plan. It was claimed that the companies could well afford paying these benefits without price increases in view of the large profits made during the previous several years. The union also contended that wage increases were necessary to increase the workers' purchasing power and thus help reverse the downward trend in business.

The representatives of the industry testified that the companies could not increase their labor costs at the time when the demand for steel was declining. They contended that such action would only serve to increase steel prices with the result of further reducing the demand for steel. The union's demands were characterized as highly inflationary and impossible to bear financially by the companies which had largely reinvested their high profits of preceding years. The contention that the demand for a pension plan was not bargainable at this time under the 1948 contract renegotiation was again unequivocally repeated.

In view of the extensions granted during the course of testimony, the hearings were not concluded until August 29, 1949, and a postponement of the reporting date to September 10, originally set for August 30, was granted. On the last day of hearings, the Board proffered its service as a mediator in the dispute, but withdrew the offer the following day.

FINDINGS AND RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE BOARD

In its report to the President, submitted on September 10, 1949, the Board, in analyzing its own activities, reaffirmed the feasibility of utilizing factfinding boards, but suggested an enlargement of the Taft-Hartley Act provisions so as to include making recommendations as a statutory function of the factfinding boards established under that law. After a detailed presentation and analysis of its own discussions as well as the arguments presented by both disputants, the Board recommended that "under present conditions"—and this qualification was strongly emphasized—no general increase in wage rates was indicated. In regard to the social insurance, the Board recommended that noncontributory plans at a cost to the companies of 4 cents an hour, be established or, where such plans already are in existence, be increased to that amount. The Board found pensions not to be bargainable under the 1948 contract, but considered them bargainable under the Taft-Hartley Act. It recommended a noncontributory plan costing the companies 6 cents an hour and enabling the workers to receive upon retirement after 65 years of age monthly benefits of about $100, including those payable under the Social Security Act.

In making its recommendations in regard to social insurance and pension plans, the Board held that "the concept of providing social insurance and pensions for workers in industry has become an accepted part of modern American thinking." Its recommendations for sole company financing rested on the opinion that "social insurance and pensions should be considered a part of normal business costs to take care of temporary and permanent depreciation in the human machine in much the same way as provision is made for depreciation and insurance of plant and machinery." It was also based on the estimate made by the Board that the total 10-cents-an-hour cost of both plans would amount to no more—and more likely to less—than 2½ percent of total cost of operations, and could, therefore, be easily afforded by the companies without an increase in steel prices. The details and specific benefits were to be determined through collective bargaining between the union and each company.

FURTHER DEVELOPMENTS AND SETTLEMENT OF THE DISPUTE

Because of the late submittal of the report and in order to allow more time for a thorough study of it, the parties agreed, at the request of the President, to extend the truce, first to September 25 and later to October 1, 1949.

The recommendations contained in the report elicited varied response from the disputing parties. While the union declared itself willing to accept the Board's proposals as the basis for settlement of the dispute, the steel companies—relying on the earlier assurance that the Board's findings would not be binding—agreed only to treat them as the basis for further negotiations. The companies expressed their willingness to study and bargain for a pension plan at a later date, but refused to be the sole contributors to pension and insurance plans. The union, however, insisted on noncontributory plans, stating that the workers did actually contribute because the cost of the programs was considered in union wage demands.

On September 16, 1949, the disputing parties were again invited to meet in Washington with Mr. Ching. The meetings were held separately on September 19 through 21, but no progress was made. Collective bargaining between the union and the companies resumed on October 23 in Pittsburgh, with the positions of the disputants essentially unchanged. Some new proposals and counterproposals were made during the first week of resumed bargaining. United States Steel, the industry leader, offered a 10-cent raise as recommended by the Board provided the employees also contribute. This was rejected by the union. A counteroffer by the union to drop pension demands in favor of a 30-cents-an-hour wage raise was rejected by the companies. On September 30, the last day of truce, Mr. Murray, president of the United Steelworkers of America, declared that the strike scheduled for the next day would be for the original 30-cents-an-hour package.

On October 1, 1949, some 500,000 members of the United Steelworkers of America walked out. Some 400,000 struck at at least 50 basic steel plants, about 12,000 at iron ore mines in the Mesabi range, and the remainder in allied industries. The strike paralyzed about 90 percent of total steel producing capacity of the Nation, but did not go into effect at the American Can Co. and two small steel producers which settled on basis of Board's recommendations before the strike deadline, and several larger companies whose contracts were to expire in October, as well as at a few plants at which existing contracts were extended for additional periods with or without temporary modifications.

During the first week of strike, Kaiser Steel Corp. (on October 5) and three small steel companies (on October 7) settled the dispute by accepting the Board's plan. Realizing that negotiations with United States Steel Corp., the usual leader in steel labor contracts, were for all practical purposes deadlocked, the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service which had been throughout the dispute actively if unobtrusively working for a settlement, invited Bethlehem Steel Corp., the second largest producer of steel, to participate in mediation conferences in hope that an agreement might be reached with a major producer. During the second week of the strike, seven more small and medium-size producers of basic steel and fabricators settled on the basis of Board's recommendations. On October 17, the strike spread to plants of the Aluminum Company of America, involving 16,000 additional USWA members.

On October 20, 1949, the Copperweld Steel Co., which had reached a partial agreement already on September 30, settled on even better terms than the Board's proposal. The union won a noncontributory package of 13 cents, of which 6 cents were allotted for pensions and 7 cents for insurance program. Two days later the union announced that during the third week of the strike 18 small companies, mostly fabricators, signed new contracts on Board's terms. Negotiations with "Big Steel," however, remained deadlocked and were temporarily broken off. This impasse prompted the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service to invite the representatives of Jones and Laughlin, Republic Steel, and Youngstown Sheet and Tube to participate in mediation talks which began on October 29. During this time two more minor companies accepted the terms of the Board's proposal.

The first major break in negotiations occurred on October 31, 1949, when Bethlehem Steel Corp. signed a new contract with the union, thus becoming the new pattern-setter for steel, a role traditionally played by United States Steel. Bethlehem contract provided for noncontributory pensions of a minimum $100 a month for workers with 25 years of service and 65 years of age. Since, however, monthly benefits were to include social security benefits, the pension program was actually contributory to the extent of workers' contributions to the latter plan. Total cost of the package was about 12 cents an hour.

On November 1, the strike spread to the plants of Allegheny-Ludlum Steel Co. whose contracts expired on October 15, and on November 4, also to the Timken Roller Bearing Co. whose contract had also run out.

Meanwhile, Bethlehem settlement spurred talks with other major producers. On November 8, Jones & Laughlin and a medium-size company settled by accepting Bethlehem plan, while Newport Steel Corp. new contract followed the Board's recommendations.

On the same day Republic Steel Corp. followed suit by accepting Bethlehem plan in regard to pensions and set up its own contributory insurance program costing the workers 3.5 cents an hour and the company 2.5 cents an hour. On November 9, Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. signed on the basis of Bethlehem plan, and negotiations resumed with United States Steel. Two days later, Bethlehem plan was accepted by United States Steel Corp. and by Inland Steel Co. The strike which still continued at several other steel plants, lost its national character.

During the week following the "Big Steel" agreements, or shortly thereafter, practically all minor producers and fabricators and the last of the 19 leading companies signed new contracts patterned after the Bethlehem plan. The sole exceptions were the agreements reached on November 13 by Oliver Iron & Steel Corp. and on November 14 by Mackintosh-Hemphill Steel Co. which provided for a 10-cent package of which 6–7 cents would go to the pension fund and the remainder for the insurance program to which the workers would also contribute 2 cents an hour. By the end of November, steel industry was operating at over 85 percent of capacity.

Alcoa and Timken settled, following Bethlehem pattern, on December 7 and 12, respectively, with the exception that Alcoa contract provided for noncontributory insurance program.

AFTERMATH

Despite the fact that the steel industry board agreed with union's contention that the cost of the new concessions could easily be absorbed by the companies, a wave of steel price increases followed in the wake of the newly negotiated contracts.

Less than 24 hours after the signing of the labor contract, Central Iron & Steel Co., of Harrisburg, on October 8, 1949, raised the price of steelplates by $5 a ton. On November 28, Sharon Steel Corp., the Nation's ninth largest producer, increased the price of hot strip products by $5 a ton, but emphasized that the new labor contract was not a factor in this increase. On December 11, Mahoning Valley Steel Co., a customer of Sharon Steel, announced $10 a ton increase for all products and justified it by claiming higher raw material and operation costs.

Price increases in "Big Steel" began on December 15 when United States Steel announced a $4 per ton increase on a wide range of products due to actual and approaching changes in production costs, including that of the new welfare plans. On December 19, Republic Steel and Armco Steel increased their prices $4 per ton, or approximately 4 percent. Bethlehem Steel, Jones & Laughlin, Youngstown Sheet & Tube, Wheeling Steel, and Pittsburgh Steel followed on December 20 with an average increase of $4 a ton, or 4 percent. Allegheny-Ludlum also joined the price hiking. On December 21, National Steel increased its prices by $3.50 a ton, Great Lakes Steel by $4 due to rising costs, Sharon Steel—this time on cold strip products—by $3. Timken's alloy steel went up 4 percent and bearings 3.3 percent, while Babcock-Wilcox began charging for its products 3 to 7½ percent more. The last major producer to increase prices was Kaiser Steel Corp., which, on December 23, announced 4 percent increases due to recent advances in steelmaking costs.

MEMORANDUM ON THE STEEL STRIKE

The article on "Government and Labor" published in The Nation on November 21, 1959, of which I was the author, discussed emergency action of our National Government as a last resort to meet a real national emergency—a clear and present danger imperiling our social structure.

I wish I could have succeeded in more clearly evoking that picture; in calling to the reader's mind in sharpest context such an emergency strike on the one hand and on the other hand the ordinary strike which is a most useful instrument, actually or potentially, in everyday collective bargaining.

Facing this sharp contrast in my own thinking, and accepting the fact that the steel strike created such a real emergency, my suggestions were:

(1) That the first governmental step must be to restore normal production.

That for this purpose the Congress should entrust to the Executive, by appropriate legislation, the power by proclamation to commandeer all production facilities for national use so long as the emergency lasts, and to require all employees in the steel industry—all production employees and all management employees—to resume their occupations forthwith.

2. That such legalized taking of private property for such use would, under the fifth amendment, make the United States liable for just compensation.

Assuming initial compensation for services of employees and for the use of facilities at rates prevailing at the time of seizure, the Government would have to determine whether such prevailing rates were, and whether they remained, just compensation. This would mean the fixing of wages, prices, and rentals by Government, presumably informed by the findings of compensation boards after investigation by due process of law.

THE ACCEPTABILITY OF THE IDEA OF SEIZURE

This idea of seizure of private property would, one might suppose, be unpalatable in a system like ours devoted to the free enterprise system. But in fact the idea of seizure seems to be generally acceptable in the face of a national emergency due to prolonged interruption of production caused by a failure of organized employees and organized employers to agree on terms and conditions of employment, as in the steel case. Perhaps this somewhat incongruous response reflects a conscious or subconscious recognition of the fact that such a failure of free collective bargaining removes the affected industry from the ranks of free enterprise; that in such a case seizure for public use can no longer be thought of as an encroachment on the free enterprise system.

However that may be, and as further evidence that the response to the idea of seizure is not what might have been expected, it is worthwhile to recall that in February 1949, when the proposal outlined in The Nation article of November 21, 1959, was developed in testimony before the Senate Committee on Labor, the idea of seizure was expressly approved by Senator Taft, although he preferred that the seizure should be done by Congress and perhaps by ad hoc legislation appropriate to the particlar emergency rather than by the President.[1]

Another item of such evidence is that the Governor of Massachusetts is authorized[2] in the event that an unsettled labor dispute threatens "the production or distribution of food, fuel, water, electric light or power, gas, or hospital or medical services" to take possession of and to operate any necessary plant or facility, and to appoint emergency boards to hold hearings and make recommendations concerning the rates of pay, wages, hours, and terms, and conditions of employment during the emergency. During these emergency conditions "concerted cessation of work or other concerted activities threatening to interfere" with the operation of such

[1] "Senator TAFT. Mr. Davis, you have outlined more or less the kind of special statute I had in mind for Congress to pass when the emergency occurred. That is, I mean you have said, or asked, did we have an ace in the hole? Well, what you describe is very much the kind of thing that I had in mind to be done by Congress, only my theory was that it ought to be done by Congress for a particular emergency to apply only to that particular emergency" (transcript p. 897).

plant or facility, is forbidden. This carefully drawn law not only evidences the appropriateness of seizure in such emergencies but, in defining as essential services the distribution of food, fuel, water, electric light or power, gas, and hospital or medical services, it evidences the widely recognized fact that such services interruptions call for immediate and effective action by the constituted authorities.

It is clear, however, that seizure must be resorted to only as the final and unavoidable step.

It is fundamentally important that the availability of seizure in a national emergency must not be permitted to reflect back into the normal procedures of collective bargaining to diminish the persuasive values of a strike or lockout under normal conditions. Whatever the Government does in a national emergency should lead back to, not away from, normal collective bargaining procedures.

These considerations lead me to suggest that there is available an intermediate procedure which retains to a substantial degree the civilizing values of freedom of choice. That is the procedure of the Railway Labor Act. It provides for a Mediation Board authorized to investigate labor disputes on the railroads, to mediate, and to suggest voluntary arbitration to the parties. If those things fail the President is authorized to appoint an Emergency Board, separately in each instance, to investigate the facts and report to the President within 30 days from the date of its creation. From the date of appointment of such an emergency board to 30 days after its report to the President—60 days in all—"no change, except by agreement, shall be made by the parties to the controversy as to the conditions out of which the dispute arose." This procedure, inappropriate and unnecessary in the normal processes of collective bargaining, became necessary and appropriate because of the essential relation of railroad transportation to interstate commerce and community welfare. In its consideration by the Congress railway management and railway labor were consulted. The law was passed with their approval during the Coolidge administration in 1926.

As this is written the Presidential Board of Inquiry has completed its factual study and its public hearings and is preparing its report for submission to the President on January 6. However, under the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act, that report will not include recommendations. Congress is about to reassemble and may do so in uncertainty as to whether the steel dispute will or will not be settled and uncertainty as to whether a failure to settle it will or will not result in a recreation of the national emergency. The country does not know with any clarity what the questions in dispute really are. The contest as it has been carried on in the press, radio, and TV has been a hodgepodge of assertions, denials, recriminations, and name calling, devoid of any responsible statement of the issues and any report of responsible collective bargaining.

We can be sure that the report of Dr. Taylor's Board of Inquiry will be at least a clear and comprehensive statement of the issues and of the negotiations.

It seems almost to suggest itself that the Congress has immediately at hand at least one way to ward off the peril. That way would be an act of Congress prior to January 26 modeled on the Railway Labor Act, extending the status quo in the steel plants for say 60 days, and authorizing a board—possibly the Taylor Board—to make recommendations as an emergency board does under the Railway Labor Act.

If such a course were backed up by further congressional enactment of the power to seize I think the people would understand that whatever happens their redeemer liveth; and that the country would much appreciate that assurance.

AMENDMENT OF CERTAIN SECTIONS OF TITLE 14, UNITED STATES CODE, RELATING TO PERSONNEL MATTERS IN U.S. COAST GUARD

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, by request I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend certain sections of title 14, United States Code, relating to personnel matters in the U.S. Coast Guard, and for other purposes. I ask unanimous consent that a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury requesting the proposed legislation be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 2811) to amend certain sections of title 14, United States Code, relating to personnel matters in the U.S. Coast Guard, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. MAGNUSON, by request, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The letter presented by Mr. MAGNUSON is as follows:

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

SIR: There is transmitted herewith a draft of a proposed bill "To amend certain sections of title 14, United States Code, relating to personnel matters in the U.S. Coast Guard, and for other purposes."

The general purpose of this proposal is to increase the efficiency and effectiveness of the Coast Guard by improvement in certain statutes relating to and governing Coast Guard organization, composition, and personnel administration. In broad terms, this proposal would serve to (1) increase the present limitation of 4 years applicable to extensions of enlistments to a new limitation of 6 years; (2) increase the present limitation of 3,000 commissioned officer personnel to a new limitation of 3,500; (3) improve the organization and composition of both the civilian teaching staff and the permanent commissioned teaching staff at the Coast Guard Academy; (4) improve the organization and composition of the top command by eliminating the present statutory position of Engineer in Chief; eliminating the present statutory term of 4 years for the Assistant Commandant; and providing for the increased grade of admiral for an officer while serving as Commandant, and of Vice Admiral for an officer while serving as an Assistant Commandant; and (5) repeal certain pertinent portions of title 14 which would be rendered obsolete by the substantive changes proposed.

The memorandum attached sets forth in greater detail the need for and nature of this proposal and an explanation and analysis of each provision of the proposed bill.

It would be appreciated if you would lay the proposed bill before the Senate. A similar proposed bill has been transmitted to the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

The Department has been advised by the Bureau of the Budget that there is no objection to the submission of the proposed legislation to the Congress.

Very truly yours,

A. GILMORE FLUES,
Acting Secretary of the Treasury.

MEMORANDUM ON PROPOSED BILL "TO AMEND CERTAIN SECTIONS OF TITLE 14, UNITED STATES CODE, RELATING TO PERSONNEL MATTERS IN THE UNITED STATES COAST GUARD, AND FOR OTHER PURPOSES"

The general purpose of this proposed legislation is to increase the efficiency and effectiveness of the Coast Guard by improvement in certain basic statutes relating to and governing Coast Guard organization, composition and personnel administration. As noted in the letter of transmittal hereto, this proposal seeks to amend certain applicable provisions of title 14, United States Code, pertaining to—

The administration of enlisted personnel of the Coast Guard;

The administration of commissioned officer personnel of the Coast Guard;

The administration of the Coast Guard Academy; and

The administration of the Office of the Commandant at Coast Guard Headquarters.

There follows a detailed explanation and analysis of each of these major areas of consideration.

THE ADMINISTRATION OF ENLISTED PERSONNEL OF THE COAST GUARD

Section 365 of title 14, presently provides for voluntary extensions of enlistments by enlisted personnel of the Coast Guard for a total period of not to exceed 4 full years. This proposed legislation would serve to increase this limitation to a period of not to exceed 6 full years.

The introduction of new weapons, electronic devices and systems in the Coast Guard today and the various training programs involving technical skills require enlisted personnel having considerable background, experience and training. In order to provide such training and be assured of the benefits resulting therefrom, it is necessary that such enlisted personnel have obligated service of from 1 to 6 years prior to being accepted for additional training. Individuals may obtain the necessary obligated service either by extension of enlistment or reenlistment for a stipulated number of years. However, in many cases, as a result of the existing restriction on extensions of enlistment, the individual member may acquire sufficient obligated service only by being discharged early for the convenience of the Goverment and immediately reenlisting for the required number of years necessary to qualify him as eligible for the desired specialized training. Early administrative discharges of this type are often undesirable to both the individual and the Coast Guard. It may be undesirable to the individual member since an early discharge from a prior enlistment for which a reenlistment bonus has been paid requires a pro rata return of that portion of the bonus for time not actually served in the previous enlistment. The Coast Guard also would prefer a simple extension of enlistment in lieu of early discharge inasmuch as the administration work required in the case of a discharge and subsequent reenlistment is necessarily considerably greater.

Therefore, in order that highly qualified personnel may be attracted to advanced training programs without loss of benefits and also to permit more economical and efficient administration by the Coast Guard, this change in the extension of enlistments has been recommended.

Section 42 of title 14 presently fixes a limit of 3,000 on the total number of commissioned officers on the active list of the Coast Guard, including permanent, temporary, temporary service, and Reserve officers on active duty, but excluding commissioned warrant officers. The amendment to this section proposed would increase the limit to 3,500.

The authorized commissioned officer billets in the service on December 1, 1958, showed 2,885 persons. The military personnel billet plan in support of the Coast Guard's fiscal year 1960 budget includes a commissioned officer strength of 2,957. Not included in this latter figure is a tentative increase of 42 commissioned officers required as an initial increment for implementation of the Federal Boating Act of 1958 (Public Law 85–911) and approximately 52 more for the loran A and loran C program expansion in fiscal years 1960 and 1961. It is estimated that on July 1, 1959, a total of 2,978 commissioned officers will be required in the service for all purposes, and that thereafter, due to expansion of the loran programs alone, this total requirement will exceed 3,000 at some time during the latter part of fiscal year 1960 or the early part of fiscal year 1961. The permanency of the programs undertaken which require additional officers leaves no alternative but to request of the Congress an increase in officer strength. The Nation's Naval Establishment could well use these additional trained officers during an emergency. The increase requested is reasonable, necessary, and urgent.

THE ADMINISTRATION OF THE COAST GUARD ACADEMY

Presently, sections 186 through 191 of title 14 make provisions for the composition, organization, method of appointment, grade level, credit for service, and retirement for both the civilian teaching staff and the permanent commissioned teaching staff at the Coast Guard Academy. This proposed legislation would serve to improve the overall administration of the Academy by making appropriate modifications in certain existing statutory provisions, applicable to both the civilian and permanent commissioned teaching staffs at the Academy.

Currently, appointments to positions on the teaching staff at the Academy are made subject to the competitive provisions of the civil service laws and regulations. Many desirable individuals are reluctant to compete for a teaching position at the Academy for various reasons. Such a requirement unduly restricts the appointing authority in his selection of applicants and does not conconform to the manner of selection and employment utilized at the U.S. Naval Academy and leading higher institutions of learning. The restriction on the number of civilians so employed to eight has hampered the administration of the Academy. The need for more civilian teachers has increased with the gradual expansion of the Academy to fulfill the growing needs of the service. There has not been the necessary accompanying flexibility in the employment of civilian members of the teaching staff. The term "civilian instructor" has been broadened to "civilian member of the teaching staff" to include all forms of civilian teaching employment and the various titles of these members, and to conform to the group nomenclature utilized in describing the permanent commissioned teaching members in sections 187, 188, 189, and 190 of title 14. This term has been utilized also in describing a similar group of teaching individuals in title 10 of the U.S. Code, which relates to the U.S. Naval Academy.

With the increased need for commissioned officers in the service over the past decade the number of graduates from the Academy has increased, necessitating a larger permanent commissioned teaching staff with flexibility in its composition to permit adjustments when demands upon the academy change. The current restrictions on the number of professors, associate professors, assistant professors, and instructors preclude expansion and appropriate distribution of the teaching staff to conform to patterns of teaching staffs adopted at modern contemporary institutions.

The descriptive adjective "commissioned" has been deleted when reference is made to an instructor on the permanent commissioned teaching staff inasmuch as the descriptive term applies to all the teachers in this group and is misleading when used only before the word instructor. The change has been made for purposes of clarity.

There are four items included in this general proposal, as follows:

1. Elimination of the present requirement for the statutory appointment of the Engineer in Chief of the Coast Guard.

Section 47 of Title 14 presently provides for the statutory appointment of the Engineer in Chief of the Coast Guard; section 48 provides for the permanent grade and placement on the active list of an officer whose statutory term of service as Engineer in Chief has expired; and section 49 provides for the retirement of an officer who has served as Engineer in Chief for a specified period of years. This proposed legislation would abolish the statutory office of the Engineer in Chief of the Coast Guard, and repeal the provisions of Title 14 applicable to this office.

The requirement for the statutory appointment of the Engineer in Chief of the Coast Guard is a relic of the days when the Coast Guard had an engineering "staff corps". The abolishment of this "staff corps" some years ago and the progressive organizational development of the Coast Guard since that time have, together, logically removed the need for a continuation of this requirement.

Today, the Engineer in Chief of the Coast Guard is the Chief of the Office of Engineering, and in Coast Guard organization as now defined, he has exactly the same stature as the other Chiefs of Offices of the Coast Guard (Operations, Personnel, Merchant Marine Safety and Comptroller). It has never been necessary to provide for statutory appointment of the Chiefs of Headquarters Offices, nor is there any remaining valid reason for the continuation of the statutory appointment process in the case of the Engineer in Chief.

On the other hand, there is obvious good reason for the Commandant of the Coast Guard to have the same administrative flexibility in selecting, assigning, and determining the tour of duty of the Engineer in Chief that he presently possesses in respect to all other headquarters chiefs of offices. Each of these officers, including the Engineer in Chief, is a principal staff assistant to the Commandant under the Assistant Commandant; each has a comparable place in the basic organization of the Coast Guard; and each has equal responsibility in his respective staff area. It follows logically, then, that each of these officers should be subject to the same process of designation and assignment.

2. Elimination of the present requirement for a fixed 4-year term upon appointment of the Assistant Commandant of the Coast Guard, and statutory provision, instead, for the administrative selection and designation of such officer.

Sections 47, 48, and 49 of title 14 relate to the appointment, subsequent active service retirement of the Assistant Commandant of the Coast Guard. This proposed legislation seeks to eliminate the present requirement for a fixed 4-year term of office for this officer, but at the same time it would continue to provide for his administrative selection and designation. This change would follow the procedure prescribed by law (title 10) in administrative assignment of the Vice Chiefs of Staff, U.S. Army and U.S. Air Force, the Assistant Commandant, U.S. Marine Corps and the Deputy Chiefs of Naval Operations, U.S. Navy.

The Assistant Commandant is the immediate and primary assistant to the Commandant and, as such, is the second senior officer in the Coast Guard. Under present (and proposed) law, the Assistant Commandant performs such duties as the Commandant may prescribe and acts as Commandant during the absence or disability of the Commandant. This is an important and responsible position in Coast Guard organization.

Administratively, no special advantage or benefit is attached to the requirement for a fixed 4-year term of the Assistant Commandant. An officer normally chosen for the position of Assistant Commandant will have already undergone close screening by the usual procedure prescribed for selection and promotion to senior grade, and with the further close screening envisioned by the proposed legislation it is not considered that the fixed term will serve any further useful purpose.

On the other hand, however, it is extremely desirable that the Commandant and the Secretary have adequate administrative flexibility in designating an officer to this post. There is evident merit in being able to prescribe the tour of duty of an Assistant Commandant to coincide precisely with administrative needs at any given time. This is not now possible since under the present statutory requirement this officer must be appointed for a specified tenure of office. This can preclude sufficient "stagger" in assignment for continuity of administration and might lead to a situation in which a Commandant is unable to terminate the services of an officer in the position of Assistant Commandant, though this officer may lack capability or suitability for continuance in this office.

Under the proposed legislation sufficient safeguards would be provided for these contingencies. The present requirement for the statutory appointment of the Assistant Commandant to flag grade has been retained. The revised wording of this section also provides that the officer so designated to serve as Assistant Commandant be selected from among those officers on the active list holding a permanent commission as captain or above. Presently, an officer with the grade of commander could be appointed as Assistant Commandant. This is inconsistent with the existing requirement that an officer must hold the grade of permanent captain to be promoted to the grade of rear admiral.

3. Provision for the increased grade of admiral for a Commandant of the Coast Guard, while so serving.

Section 44 of title 14 presently fixes the grade of an officer while serving as Commandant of the Coast Guard as vice admiral. The legislation proposed would serve to increase the grade of a Commandant to that of admiral. There are several significant considerations which prompt this proposal.

First, there is the important consideration of proper composition and organization of the Coast Guard. The Coast Guard, as is true of the other Armed Forces, can be likened to a corporation doing substantial business, and the Commandant of the Coast Guard can be readily compared with the president of a large corporation. As Commandant of the Coast Guard, an officer while so serving has on the order of 35,000 personnel, both military and civilian, under his command and supervision; he is responsible for the operation and maintenance of some 1,750 separate Coast Guard facilities located within the continental United States and in many oversea areas; he has in his custody and good keeping Government property valued at nearly $2 billion; he controls and administers Government spending on the order of about a quarter billion dollars each year; and his total job encompasses some 20 to 30 separately identifiable duties, demanding a wide range of experience, knowledge, and know-how. Moreover, as "president of the corporation," he is in close and continuing contact with many of the top echelons of industry and of Government (both military and civilian). He must also maintain contact with many individuals in private enterprises. In some instances, these business contacts are at the international level. In these respects the scope and content of responsibility involved and associated elements such as prestige are job factors which cannot be regarded lightly.

Second, it is important to emphasize that the present proposal to give the Commandant of the Coast Guard the higher grade of admiral is not without precedent. During World War II and until 1950, the Commandant did hold the grade of admiral. Basically, this higher grade was a product of the war and a direct result of the mobilization requirement attendant thereto and, as such, was prompted partly by the Coast Guard's increased wartime strength. Despite this, there is little doubt but that the decision at that time to provide the Commandant of the Coast Guard with the four-star grade of admiral was founded also on the logical desire to afford the Commandant suitable rank status within the Navy. It is significant, also, to note that the higher grade of admiral was first held by the Commandant during the war years when the Coast Guard was serving as a specialized but subordinate service under the Navy, rather than in its present-day status of an independent branch of the Armed Forces under the Treasury. Moreover, in the event of mobilization it would be desirable to have the Commandant in an equitable rank status with the chiefs of the other Armed Forces.

Third, there are the related considerations of rank-to-strength ratio and promotional opportunity in the Coast Guard, as viewed in terms of parity with other Armed Forces. Justification for the increased grade of the Commandant of the Coast Guard should not be based simply on a me-to parity with the other services; nonetheless these are strong, contributing considerations. Generally speaking, the basic statutes governing the other Armed Forces provide in respect to each of these services that about 15 percent of the total number of flag or general officers in the respective services may serve in the three- and four-star grades of vice admiral and admiral or lieutenant general and general. This means, in effect, that in the other services the ratio of officers serving in grades above rear admiral/major general to those serving in those grades is about 1 to 7, hence it follows that each officer serving in a two-star grade has about 1 in 7 opportunity for further promotion to the three- or four-star grades. This is not presently the case in the Coast Guard. In terms of the Coast Guard's flag strength of 17 officers, the ratio of officers serving in a grade above rear admiral to the number of officers in that grade is presently 1 in 16, since only the Commandant now holds a grade higher than two stars. This ratio is, of course, substantially less than that in the other Armed Forces, which is 1 in 7. However, if the changes advocated are accepted, the Coast Guard will then be allowed a ratio similar to that of the other services. There would then be 15 officers serving as rear admirals and 1 each as vice admiral and admiral. The promotional opportunity of rear admirals would then compare favorably with their contemporaries in the other Armed Forces.

Finally, section 44 of title 14 presently provides that a Commandant may be appointed from among those officers on the active list who hold the permanent grade of commander or above. Here again, as has been pointed out earlier, this requirement should be revised to be consistent with the requirement that only captains are eligible for promotion to flag rank.

4. Provision for the increased grade of vice admiral for an Assistant Commandant of the Coast Guard, while so serving, and his retirement.

Section 47 of title 14 presently fixes the grade of an officer while serving as Assistant Commandant of the Coast Guard as rear admiral (upper half). The revision of this section being proposed would serve to increase this grade to that of vice admiral. Justification for this proposal should be evident from earlier discussions in this memorandum relating to the increased grade of the Commandant.

In addition, inasmuch as the Assistant Commandant ranks next after the Commandant and is the second senior officer in the Coast Guard, the duties and responsibilities of the Commandant's office devolve upon him during the absence or disability of the Commandant or in the event of a vacancy in the office of Commandant. It is obvious that the total job of the Assistant Commandant is similar to that of the Commandant. In view of the weight of responsibility imposed upon the Assistant Commandant and the vital nature of his position, it is only appropriate that he should hold a grade commensurate with his job, that of vice admiral.

With the Commandant serving in the grade of admiral and the Assistant Commandant serving in the grade of vice admiral, there would be a natural and logical grade separation between the Commandant, the Assistant Commandant and staff office chiefs and top line commanders (rear admirals). At present, the Assistant Commandant as a rear admiral is indistinguishable from all other rear admirals, gradewise. This is not a proper recognition of his real status. The proposal to increase the grade of the Assistant Commandant to vice admiral would result in an executive pattern following accepted principles of sound organization and management.

Finally, increasing the grade of the Assistant Commandant to vice admiral would give him equitable status with the second senior officer (the Assistant Commandant) of the Marine Corps, and more suitable status with the second senior officers in the other Armed Forces, all of whom serve in 4-star grade. Retirement of the Assistant Commandant in 3-star grade would be permitted only after 2½ years' service in this office or physical disability while in office, otherwise eventual retirement of this officer would be in his regular permanent grade unless entitled to a higher retired grade pursuant to other provisions of law except section 243 of title 14.

The proposals to eliminate the requirement for the statutory appointment of the Assistant Commandant and the Engineer in Chief would not become effective until the expiration of the present terms of appointment held by the present incumbents. The proposals to increase the grades of the Commandant and the Assistant Commandant would become effective on the first day of the month following enactment of this act.

COST AND BUDGET DATA

Enactment of this legislation will require only an insignificant increase in Coast Guard (Treasury Department) appropriations. The added annual cost for the proposals contained herein would total approximately $8,900. This figure would include the future increased retired pay of an average of two retired Commandants and two retired Assistant Commandants, this being the average number of officers in those categories over the past several years.

AMENDMENT OF COMMUNICATIONS ACT RELATIVE TO PAINTING AND ILLUMINATION OF RADIO TOWERS

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, by request, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend the Communications Act of 1934 with respect to the painting and illumination of radio towers. I ask unanimous consent that a letter from the Chairman of the Federal Communications Commission requesting the proposed legislation may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 2812) to amend the Communications Act of 1934 with respect to the painting and illumination of radio towers, introduced by Mr. MAGNUSON, by request, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The letter presented by Mr. MAGNUSON is as follows:

FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION,
Washington, D.C., December 18, 1959.

THE VICE PRESIDENT,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. VICE PRESIDENT: The Commission wishes to recommend again for the consideration of the Congress the enactment of legislation amending the Communications Act of 1934 (as amended) to require that abandoned or unused radio towers continue to meet the same painting and lighting requirements that would be applicable if such towers were being used pursuant to license issued by the Federal Communications Commission (47 U.S.C. 303(q)).

The Commission previously recommended this amendment and H.R. 6746 and S. 1874 were so introduced in the 85th Congress. Attached is a copy of the bill as we drafted it as well as the justification.

The Bureau of the Budget advised the Commission that "there will be no objection to the presentation of the draft bill to the Congress for its consideration."

The Commission considers the enactment of this legislation of importance for facilitating a solution in the problems raised by the joint use of airspace by the aviation and broadcast industries so as to minimize the hazards to aviation safety. It is therefore hoped that this proposal will receive early and favorable consideration by the Congress.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN C. DOERFER,
Chairman.

JUSTIFICATION FOR PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO SECTION 303 OF THE COMMUNICATIONS ACT OF 1934 (TO REQUIRE THAT ABANDONED RADIO TOWERS CONTINUE TO MEET THE PAINTING AND LIGHTING REQUIREMENTS THAT WOULD BE APPLICABLE IF USED PURSUANT TO LICENSE), 47 U.S.C. 303(Q)

The Commission wishes to recommend at this time for the consideration of the Congress the enactment of legislation amending the Communications Act of 1934, as amended, to require that abandoned or unused radio towers continue to meet the same painting and lighting requirements that would be applicable if such towers were being used pursuant to license issued by the Federal Communications Commission, 47 U.S.C. 303(q).

Concern has been expressed by aviation interests, both Government and non-Government, and by the general public, over the steadily increasing number of tall antenna towers, particularly those over 1,000 feet, which if left unmarked and standing at any future time, would present a serious hazard to safety in the field of aviation. The current trend toward many high radio antenna towers presents a much more acute problem than that which has existed in the past, due to the much greater speeds attained by modern aircraft and due to the fact that towers built in the past are as a general rule of much less height than those currently being constructed. Furthermore, radio towers, being of latticed construction, are inherently less visible than solid structures such as buildings, water towers, smokestacks, and the like.

This concern about the present potential hazard to aviation safety prompted the Air Coordinating Committee to establish a Joint Industry/Government Tall Structures Committee (JIGTSC) to investigate the problems raised in the joint use of airspace by the aviation and broadcast industries, and to recommend appropriate action establishing the position of the Federal Government in this matter. One of JIGTSC's recommendations was that "the FCC require the removal or appropriate lighting and marking of unused or abandoned towers if it has such authority, and if such authority does not exist * * * that the FCC seek appropriate legislation to obtain this objective."

This Commission, after study and consideration of this JIGTSC recommendation concluded that it would be of public benefit to require the removal or appropriate lighting and marking of radio towers, both during and subsequent to their use for radio transmitting purposes.

Section 303(q) of the Communications Act currently provides:

"SEC. 303. Except as otherwise provided in this Act, the Commission from time to time, as public convenience, interest, or necessity requires shall—

"(q) Have authority to require the painting and/or illumination of radio towers if and when in its judgment such towers constitute, or there is a reasonable possibility that they may constitute, a menace to air navigation."

The criteria which have been adopted pursuant to this authority against which aeronautical hazard is gaged in particular cases are set forth in part 17 of the rules of this Commission, "Concerning the Construction, Marking, and Lighting of Antenna Towers and Supporting Structures." In general, these criteria provide that radio towers exceeding 170 feet in height require obstruction marking irrespective of location, and under these criteria the number of radio towers that can be approved without obstruction marking greatly exceeds those requiring such marking. The painting and lighting specifications imposed under part 17, as amended from time to time, provide an adequate vehicle for the protection of aviation interests and otherwise meet the Commission's responsibilities under present law; however, these criteria are applicable at this point only to towers used in connection with authorized radio station operation. Accordingly, these criteria would not be applicable under present law and regulations to towers which have at one time been licensed for use in connection with the transmission of radio communications, but which become no longer licensed for that purpose. These towers, in this sense, become abandoned towers and create the particular problem now sought to be remedied.

Abandonment can occur by voluntary act of the licensee, as when the license is permitted to expire or is submitted for cancellation, or when the licensee fails to contest an order to show cause, in consequence of which the license is revoked. Involuntary abandonment normally results from bankruptcy, death, or other legal disability affecting the licensee. Since the events leading to abandonment normally coincide with expiration, cancellation, or revocation of the station license, the Commission is at that juncture powerless to compel continued obstruction marking by invoking the administrative sanctions normally available to it, except those cases where other radio licenses are outstanding in the name of the same person.

Further, the FCC is the Federal agency which has final authority to authorize the construction of towers to be used as part of a licensed radio station operation and has the authority to require the painting and/or illumination of such towers. In addition, the newly formed Federal Aviation Agency, which is the Federal agency having primary responsibility over the navigable airspace, recognizes the FCC's authority in the field of antenna towers. On page 12 of the "FAA and Airspace," issued by the Federal Aviation Agency, August 1959, it states:

"Airspace matters in which FAA has an interest but does not make the final decision."

The types of airspace cases which fall into this category are:

"1. Applications to the Federal Communications Commission for construction of radio or TV transmitting towers which may involve or create an aeronautical hazard. The final action on these cases is taken by the Federal Communications Commission."

Therefore, it is logical, and orderly administration would appear to dictate, that the FCC deal with the problem of assuring to the greatest extent possible that radio antenna towers be properly lighted and painted at all times—i.e., both during and subsequent to their use for radio transmitting purposes.

The Commission considers the enactment of this legislation, which has been coordinated with the Air Coordinating Committee and its member agencies, of the utmost importance for facilitating a solution to the problems raised by the joint use of airspace by the aviation and broadcast industries so as to minimize the hazards to aviation safety.

REMOVAL OF THE INTEREST RATE CEILING

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, I wish to join the other Members of the Senate who have expressed support for the President's proposal to eliminate the arbitrary ceiling on interest rates for long-term Government bonds.

In this connection, Mr. President, I am today joining the chairman of the Committee on Finance, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] in introducing for appropriate reference a bill which will carry out the objectives of the President's recommendations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 2813) to provide for more effective management of the public debt by removing the remaining interest rate restrictions on public issues of Government securities, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. BYRD of Virginia (for himself and Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I do not think there is any more pressing problem confronting this Congress than that of acting upon this proposed legislation. I do not think this is a question of whether the individual Members of the Congress are either for or against high interest rates or whether they approve or disapprove of the policy of the Federal Reserve System. The question which is confronting us is, Are we going to give the Secretary of the Treasury the power to carry out the normal functions of his office, which include the financing of the public debt in the best interests of the American people?

Unless we pass this proposed legislation to remove the interest rate ceiling on long-term bonds we will force even higher the short-term interest rates on Government securities. Interest on short-term money is already as high as 5 percent, and continued concentration of all our financing in this one range will force even higher rates of interest.

If we fail to remove this arbitrary ceiling the Secretary will be confronted with two choices. Either he will have to finance our public debt with short-term bonds, which is, in effect, a trend toward monetizing our debt; or he will have to sell long-term bonds which have a stated 4¼ percent interest at a discount. The latter procedure is not good debt management. The Secretary has said he will not resort to it, and I commend him for that position. This is a serious situation which confronts us. Congress cannot afford to play loosely with the finances of this Government. The security of the American dollar is at stake, and our failure to take proper action may well precipitate serious economic repercussions both at home and abroad.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I yield.

Mr. BUSH. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

I am very glad to see the Senator introduce the bill. Does the Senator agree with me that in maintaining a ceiling upon interest rates for the long-term bonds we are not really maintaining a ceiling on interest rates at all? Within this very week the Treasury has sold bonds at interest rates in excess of that ceiling. What we are maintaining is a ceiling on maturities.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. That is correct.

Mr. BUSH. We are in effect saying, "You cannot sell any bonds with more than a 5-year maturity."

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. That is the net effect of our action.

Mr. BUSH. That is exactly what we are doing. It is not an interest rate ceiling at all, so far as the Government credit is concerned; it is simply a case of tying the Government's hands and saying, "You cannot sell any bonds for terms longer than 5 years."

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Unquestionably the Senator is correct. If this arbitrary ceiling on these bonds were removed and we could finance the debt as it should be financed with the long-term issues, I feel sure interest rates would actually be lower than they are today. Today we are paying 5 percent for maturities of less than 5 years.

Mr. BUSH. That is absolutely correct.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Those who speak out against raising the interest rate ceiling are defeating their own purposes when they tie the Secretary's hands.

After all, I think we should remember that the Secretary of the Treasury does not appropriate the money. The Secretary of the Treasury is not responsible for the fact that we had $10 billion or $12 billion deficit to be financed. We in Congress appropriated the money. The Secretary is charged only with the responsibility of paying our debts and arranging for financing if it has to be borrowed. We are in an indefensible position in the Congress if we do not give the Secretary the power to administer the functions of his office.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. BUTLER. Is it not true that at the time the Treasury sold some of these short-term issues at 5 percent interest the Treasury could have sold the longer term bonds at the same rate of interest?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. The Treasury could have sold the longer term bonds at lower rates of interest. The long term Government bonds today are quoted in the Wall Street Journal at a quarter to a half point in interest rates lower than the amount being paid for the 2-year and 5-year bonds.

Mr. BUTLER. Would that not be very much to the advantage of the Government and to the advantage of every American citizen?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Yes, It would save the American taxpayers money in regard to interest rates. By concentrating all of the Government financing in the short-term money market, we are creating a shortage of short-term money and a surplus of long-term money.

Besides, short-term debt is much more inflationary. It canot be denied that the American taxpayers are actually paying more in interest on our public debt under the present system than they would pay if the arbitrary ceiling were removed.

Mr. BUTLER. So what we are doing, in reality, is forcing the Treasury into a tight-money market more frequently, which has the effect of constantly increasing the rate.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. That is true. Another point is that we are breaking down the confidence of the international banking system in the willingness of the American Government to face the facts of life and finance our debt as it should be financed. This threatens the stability of the American dollar.

Short-term money is inflationary. It is recognized as such by all parties concerned. I do not believe there is anything we are doing that could contribute more toward inflation than rejection of the President's proposal. This point should be made clear, then let the responsibility rest on those who dare to oppose this proposal of the President.

Mr. BUTLER. I thank the Senator. I am very happy to support the bill, and I shall fight side by side with him to see that it is made law.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I believe that the bill being introduced jointly by the distinguished Senator from Delaware and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] will deal with probably the most important issue to come before the second session of the 86th Congress.

I listened to some of the speeches on the floor of the Senate last night on the monetary question. There seems to be a tendency to try to divorce all these issues from certain realities. There has been an outflow of gold. There is so much gold earmarked for foreign account in the Federal Reserve Bank in New York. There has been a deficit in our trade balance, and it involves, as the Senator from Delaware has so rightly said, confidence, both at home and abroad. When we encounter a situation in which, by the stroke of a pen, the gold could leave us, and billions of dollars worth of securities could be dumped, on the theory that we as a people will not face up to the situation and undergo the sacrifices which are necessary adequately to manage a $290 billion debt, then we have come to a very serious pass, indeed. I believe that by all odds this is the most important problem and the greatest challenge before the country at the present time.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I thank the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. I am a member of the Joint Economic Committee. I have noticed something which may interest the Senator, and I would appreciate the Senator's comment upon it.

It seems to me that what is being attempted here is to hold down the result of the disease—inflation and high interest rates—on the theory that that will cure the situation, whereas, as a matter of fact, it may have exactly the opposite effect, as the Senator has described.

The Senator will agree that many of us, including myself, have objections to the way in which monetary and fiscal policy has been handled. We believe that if it had been handled differently, the result might have been lower interest rates. However, the fact is that to try to correct the situation in this way is only worsening it, because we are trying to prevent the issue from breaking out and the situation being sooner remedied. We are kidding ourselves. That is exactly what is being done by those who think they are going to bring about lower interest rates, because they frustrate the process, and the result is higher rates.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I agree. I pointed out earlier that I do not believe the question before us is whether we approve or disapprove of the interest policies of the Federal Reserve. That question can be debated as a separate issue. The question with which we are confronted is, Will we give to the Secretary of the Treasury adequate authority to finance properly the public debt?

I cannot conceive of any company in America which would limit the president of the company to the point where he could borrow money only on a 1-year or 2-year basis. Certainly the directors would give him the authority to finance the debt of the company on a more favorable basis, on the basis of long-term debt, if the opportunity were offered.

We as Members of Congress are the directors of a large operation—our Government. The Secretary of the Treasury is charged with the responsibility of financing a $290 billion debt. The least we can do is to give to the man charged with the financing of that debt adequate authority to carry out the functions of his office in the best interests of all the American people.

As I pointed out earlier, we are paying a higher interest rate for short-term money today than we are on 20-year bonds. This is a complete reversal of all past experience. The President was certainly right when he strongly recommended that we take prompt action.

In conclusion, I ask that the President's brief message to Congress of last Tuesday be printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks. Immediately thereafter I ask that there be printed a table which appeared in today's Wall Street Journal, showing that long-term Government bonds, even under existing conditions, are selling at discounts whereby their yield is far in excess of the 4¼ percent ceiling.

These statistics completely refute any argument that congressional refusal to raise the present 4¼ percent ceiling on long-term Government bonds will keep interest rates down or will save the taxpayer's money. I call particular attention to the fact that rates on the longer maturities are lower than the intermediate terms, and they are all lower than the 5 percent recently paid by the Treasury on a 4½-year note.

There being no objection, the message and table were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

As I said in my state of the Union message, the Treasury is being prevented from taking debt-management actions that are fully consistent with the public interest because of the artificial interest rate ceiling on new Treasury medium and long-term issues.

In a special message to the Congress on June 8, 1959, I urged the removal of this archaic restriction on flexible debt management. Congressional inaction on that request has resulted in a much more rapid increase in short-term debt than would otherwise have occurred. As a result, short-term Treasury borrowing costs have risen to the highest levels in several decades and the ability of debt management to operate in a manner consistent with sound principles of sustained economic growth has been seriously undermined.

I deem it imperative, therefore, that this restrictive ceiling be removed. I am asking the Secretary of the Treasury to transmit to the Congress proposed legislation designed to attain this objective.

DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I yield.

Mr. KUCHEL. I have been intensely interested in what the Senator has said, and what others of my colleagues have said during the past few moments. Will the Senator indicate how he would accurately define a short-term Federal Government obligation?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. The Federal Government classifies as a short-term obligation any note with a maturity below 5 years. Such Treasury obligations are classified as Treasury notes, with less than 1-year maturity they are classified as bills. When they move beyond that point, to 10, 15, or 30 years, they are classified as bonds or long-term obligations. That is the classification generally used.

As the result of the 4¼ percent arbitrary ceiling the Secretary is now confronted with a situation in which he can sell only obligations of the Government with a maturity of less than 5 years. Recently he paid 5 percent on an issue of 4 years and 11 months.

There is no ceiling today on short-term obligations. The Secretary can pay 6, 8, or 10 percent on short-term obligations. What we are doing is forcing him to concentrate all his new borrowings or refinancing into the short-term money market. There is only a limited amount of money available in the short-term market. Certain groups of investors will buy only short-term securities. Other types of investors want to put their money in longer term securities. We are denying to the Secretary of the Treasury the opportunity to dip into the long-term money market to finance any part of our debt.

The ironical part of it is that the financing could be done on the basis of a quarter to a half of 1 percent lower interest rates than we are now paying.

For the benefit of our friends on the other side of the aisle who are bewailing the high interest rates, I invite attention to the fact that our failure to act on this proposal sooner is costing us from a quarter to a half of 1 percent more interest than we would have been required to pay had the ceiling been removed a year ago.

Mr. KUCHEL. What our friends on the other side of the aisle are doing is forcing the Government of the United States to borrow money solely on a short-term basis, and to that extent adding to the fires of inflation.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. That is correct.

Mr. KUCHEL. I thank my friend.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, first of all I wish to associate myself with the remarks of the Senator from Delaware and other Senators who have participated in the colloquy. I endorse this philosophy wholeheartedly. I intend to have more to say on the subject later.

CONSTRUCTION LOANS FOR BRACKISH WATER CONVERSION PLANTS

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CASE], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER], the Senator from Hawaii [Mr. LONG], the senior Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL], and the junior Senator from California [Mr. ENGLE], I introduce for appropriate reference, a bill to provide Government loans to cities and communities that are faced with the problem of expanding their municipal water supplies, and where, because of deficient or brackish underground supplies, or where surface supplies are not readily available, they find it an economic necessity to purchase saline water conversion equipment to obtain sufficient potable water to meet their growing municipal demands.

This bill will serve the very important function of bridging the gap between saline water conversion research and the practical application of the processes that have been developed.

To purchase the necessary conversion equipment, the only course of action now open to most cities and communities facing this problem is to raise the necessary funds through a general obligation or revenue bond issue. Because of the semiexperimental nature of saline water conversion equipment, bonds issued to purchase this type of equipment would undoubtedly bear a high interest rate which, in turn, would substantially increase the cost of the product water.

This bill is designed to permit the cities to purchase the necessary conversion equipment through a Government loan, thereby assuring lowest possible interest rates which, in turn, will be reflected in the rate the city must charge its customers for this basic commodity.

Although considerable progress has been made by the Office of Saline Water in developing low-cost conversion processes, water obtained by this method is still relatively expensive. The citizens of cities and communities that have no other choice but to turn to converted sea or brackish water as their source of supply are, without question, entitled to obtain that water at the lowest possible cost.

Throughout the Nation our demand for fresh water is growing at an alarming rate. In 1900 we used about 40 billion gallons of water per day. By 1940 our daily demand had reached 135 billion gallons per day. Since that time our uses have more than doubled. A report just released by the U.S. Bureau of Mines shows an estimated total water use of 195 billion gallons a day in 1958, and the U.S. Geological Survey predicts we can expect this figure to more than double in the next 20 years, reaching a total daily use of 597 billion gallons per day.

The impact of the growing demands we are placing on our available water supplies is clearly evidenced by the number of cities and communities that asked to be considered as a site for one of the five saline water conversion demonstration plants authorized by Public Law 85–883. The Department of the Interior has received nearly 200 applications from every State on the coastal perimeter, except Delaware, from Alaska, Hawaii, and from 12 inland States.

I am deeply concerned by the number of cities and communities that are seeking to have one of these plants located in their area because they are desperate for additional supplies of fresh water. It is unmistakably clear that the Federal Government must take positive and immediate action to eliminate a problem that is rapidly reaching critical proportions in many areas of our land.

The bill permits any State, territory, possession, political subdivision thereof, or publicly owned public utility organization to apply to the Secretary of the Interior for a loan to finance the design and construction of a sea water or brackish water conversion plant. The loan may not exceed 90 percent of the cost of design and construction—excluding land and water costs—or $1 million, whichever is smaller.

If the Secretary finds that the construction is feasible and that the loan would be a reasonable risk, he may approve the application and transmit it to Congress. If Congress does not disapprove the application by resolution within 60 days, an appropriation may be requested and if the appropriation is made the loan may be completed.

The loan must be repaid in 40 years, with interest at a rate that is fixed by estimating the average annual yield on Government obligations with a 15-year or longer maturity date.

The bill also permits the Secretary to contract with the borrower for the use of the borrower's plant facilities for further research and demonstration, and reasonable compensation for such use may be made by a credit on the borrower's loan.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLOTT. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. KUCHEL. I wish to congratulate my able friend from the State of Colorado for the introduction of the bill dealing with the problem of saline water and the problem of Federal assistance through credit to the political subdivisions in the country which are interested in building conversion plants. I wish to say to my friend that I had hoped, prior to his introduction of the bill, that I might have been able to discuss the matter with him. However, having listened to his fine statement, I simply wished to ask his consent to be joined with him and his other colleagues as a co-sponsor of the bill.

Mr. ALLOTT. I appreciate that statement very much. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD, and I make the further request that it may lie on the desk through January 26, to permit other Senators, who may desire to do so, to join as cosponsors.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will be printed in the RECORD, and lie on the desk through January 26, as requested by the Senator from Colorado.

The bill (S. 2816) to authorize loans for the design and construction of sea and brackish water conversion plants, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. ALLOTT (for himself, Mr. CASE of South Dakota, Mr. CHAVEZ, Mr. NEUBERGER, Mr. LONG of Hawaii, and Mr. KUCHEL), was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it is the purpose of this Act to stimulate the construction of plants for the production, from sea water or brackish water, of water that is suitable for municipal or other beneficial consumptive uses, and thereby make maximum use of the research for the development and utilization of saline waters that was authorized by the Act of June 22, 1955 (69 Stat. 198), and maximum use of the demonstration program that was authorized by the Act of September 2, 1958 (72 Stat. 1706).

SEC. 2. (a) Any State, territory, possession, political subdivision or agency thereof, or publicly owned public utility organization, hereinafter called "organization", may submit to the Secretary of the Interior in such form as the Secretary may prescribe an application for a loan, or an offer to sell to the United States securities of the organization, to finance the design and construction of a plant to produce, from sea water or brackish water, water that is suitable for municipal, industrial, domestic, or other beneficial consumptive use.

(b) Such application shall include a showing (1) that the organization already holds or can acquire all lands and interests in land and rights, pursuant to State law, to the use of water that are necessary for the successful construction, operation, and maintenance of the plant, and (2) that the organization is ready, able, and willing to finance by other means the portion of the cost of design and construction that is not covered by the loan application or offer to sell securities.

(c) An application for a loan or an offer to sell securities may not be made in accordance with the provisions of this Act in an amount that exceeds 90 per centum of the estimated cost of design and construction (exclusive of land and water costs), or $1,000,000, whichever is smaller.

SEC. 3. (a) At such time as the Secretary approves an application or offer after finding that the construction is feasible and that the loan or purchase of securities would be a reasonable risk, he shall transmit to Congress the application or offer, his approval, and his findings.

(b) No appropriation shall be made for a loan to, or a purchase of securities from, the organization prior to sixty calendar days (which sixty days shall not include days on which either the House of Representatives or the Senate is not in session because of an adjournment of more than three calendar days to a day certain) from the date on which the Secretary's findings and approval are submitted to the Congress and then only if, within said sixty days, the Congress does not approve the application or offer by resolution.

SEC. 4. Either concurrently with the submission to Congress of an application or offer, or after the time for congressional disapproval has expired without the adoption of a resolution of disapproval, the Secretary may negotiate and execute an agreement with the organization which shall set out, among other things:

(a) The maximum amount of the loan or the securities to be purchased.

(b) The time and method for making the money available to the organization.

(c) A plan for the repayment of the loan in not more than forty years in periodic installments that need not necessarily be in equal amounts, and for the payment of interest on unamortized balances, beginning three months after the plant first commences operation, or at a rate determined by the Secretary of the Interior by estimating the average annual yield to maturity, on the basis of daily closing market bid quotations or prices during the month of May preceding the fiscal year in which the loan is made, on all outstanding marketable obligations of the United States having a maturity date of fifteen or more years from the first day of such month of May, and by adjusting such estimated average annual yield to the nearest one-eighth of 1 per centum at the beginning of the fiscal year preceding the date on which the agreement is executed; or, in the case of an offer to sell securities, a plan of redemption that is consistent with the foregoing requirements with respect to a loan.

(d) Provisions for assuring and securing the prompt repayment of the loan and interest or for the redemption of the securities.

(e) Provisions making the liability of the United States under the agreement contingent upon the availability of appropriations for the purpose.

SEC. 5. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to contract with a borrower under this Act for the use of the borrower's plant facilities to further the sea and brackish water research and demonstration programs authorized by the Act of June 22, 1955 (69 Stat. 198), and the Act of September 2, 1958 (72 Stat. 1706), and to provide in the contract for a credit on the organization's loan, or for a cancellation of its securities, in an amount up to 25 per centum of the original amount thereof that represents reasonable compensation to the borrower for the research and demonstration use made of his facilities.

SEC. 6. No loan or purchase of securities shall be made pursuant to this Act if the Secretary determines that in his judgment the organization can obtain funds on reasonable terms from other sources.

SEC. 7. There are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act and all such appropriations shall remain available until expended.

Mr. ALLOTT. I wish to say to my friend from California that I appreciate very much his interest in this bill.

CAMPAIGN SPENDING: LET US TREAT THE DISEASE, NOT THE SYMPTOMS

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, S. 2436 is grossly inadequate as a vehicle for reforming present Federal campaign spending laws.

It does not deal with primary elections or conventions of political parties; in a number of States, nomination is tantamount to election.

It does not cover intrastate committees, yet such committees play a highly significant role in election financing.

It places no effective limitation on individual campaign contributions.

It does not limit campaign expenditures.

But it is in philosophy, not procedures, that the bill's major fault lies.

S. 2436 would attempt to plug up reporting loopholes and to establish more realistic contribution and expenditure limitations. However, the problem we confront in campaign spending is not one which can be solved by new reports or recognition of the fact of inflation. This is treating symptoms without curing the disease.

LARGE CONTRIBUTIONS REAL ISSUE

The real issue involved in campaign spending is inherent in the simple fact that candidates for Federal elective office are increasingly forced to rely on large contributions to bring their candidacies before the voters.

Mr. President, it is reported that in 1846 a Whig candidate running for Congress in Illinois was given $200 by friends to enable him to campaign. Following his successful race, the candidate returned $199.25 with this comment: "I did not need the money," he said. "I made the canvass on my own horse; my entertainment, being at the houses of friends, cost me nothing; and my only outlay was 75 cents for a barrel of cider, which some farmhands insisted I should treat them to."

Campaign costs have increased vastly since Abraham Lincoln's campaign for Congress in 1846.

In 1958, candidates for the House and Senate reported personal spending of $3,382,655 and organizations reported a total of $8,675,466. One can only guess at the amount of money expended but not reported in House and Senate contests in 1958. It has been suggested costs of a campaign for a Senate seat in a small State are as high as $200,000, and about $1 million in a big industrial State. The authority for this is the noted William S. White, author of Citadel.

PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGNS COSTLY

An expert in the field of campaign spending, Prof. Alexander Heard, has estimated that the two leading parties spent $140 million during the presidential campaign in 1952. The 1956 presidential race involved estimated expenditures of over $200 million.

An examination of the amount of money spent on radio and television in recent campaigns is illustrative of the magnitude of the financing required for political campaigns.

In his study "Television and Presidential Politics," published by the Brookings Institution and concerned with the 1952 presidential election, Charles A. H. Thomas reports that, "Prior to the Republication convention, the NBC network alone carried 9 broadcasts for various Eisenhower sponsors, totaling 7½ hours of broadcast time at a gross-time charge of $118,938.73." The magazine Advertising Age stated in 1952 that Republicans spent between $1.3 and $1.5 million on radio and television spots in an 11-State area.

SIX MILLION DOLLARS SPENT ON TV

The Thomas study indicates that in 1952 Republicans spent approximately $3.5 million for all radio-television campaigning, including some $2.1 million for network time, while Democrats spent about $2.5 million with $1.5 million devoted to network time.

Today, 30 minutes of prime television time on a nationwide hookup costs about $70,000.

In 1872, 2 years after adoption of the first comprehensive Federal statute dealing with election corruption, cost of electing a President was $200,000—less than the cost of 180 minutes of prime television time today.

Everyone agrees that modern election costs have made present limitations on campaign spending unrealistic, and that they are in fact dead letters.

Excesses in the collection and expenditure of modern campaign funds are largely the result of unrestricted competition for public attention through extremely expensive media, particularly television, radio, printed materials, and signs. As long as candidates must raise from private sources the vast sums needed for this expensive competition, it will be futile to try to curb by legal limits and penalties their reliance on large campaign contributions, with all the attendant dangers to true representative democracy.

PUBLIC SHOULD SHARE COST

The large expenditure needed for a modern campaign has multiplied many times in the years since this country was founded. The time has come to recognize that in a democracy the presentation of political candidates and issues to the voters in a campaign is not something done for the candidates, but for the public who must exercise as informed a choice as they can among them. The expense of making this information equitably available to the electorate is a legitimate cost of democratic self-government.

President Theodore Roosevelt told Congress in 1907 that—

> The need for collecting large campaign funds would vanish if Congress provided an appropriation for the proper and legitimate expenses of each of the great national parties, an appropriation ample enough to meet the necessity for thorough organization and machinery, which requires a large expenditure of money.

In his annual message to Congress in that year, Mr. Roosevelt declared that—

> The stipulation should be made that no party receiving campaign funds from the Treasury should accept more than a fixed amount from any individual subscriber or donor; and the necessary publicity for receipts and expenditures could without difficulty be provided.

Mr. President, I believe that the suggestion advanced by President Theodore Roosevelt is a sound one. As he pointed out to Congress and the Nation more than 50 years ago:

> Under our form of government voting is not merely a right but a duty, and, moreover, a fundamental and necessary duty if a man is to be a good citizen. It is well to provide that corporations shall not contribute to presidential or national campaigns, and furthermore to provide for the publication of both contributions and expenditures. There is, however, always danger in laws of this kind, which from their very nature are difficult of enforcement; the danger being lest they be obeyed only by the honest, and disobeyed by the unscrupulous, so as to act only as a penalty upon honest men. Moreover, no such law would hamper an unscrupulous man of unlimited means from buying his own way into office.

I wish to suggest today that this country now heed Theodore Roosevelt's advice.

The problem we face is well stated by Jasper B. Shannon, of the University of Nebraska, in his book, "Money and Politics":

> The basic problem of political leadership in representative government is to discover a means by which officials may be selected to act as the State's men—politicians—who be aware of and sensitive to the various interests of a political society without being politically and personally dependent for livelihood upon private interests.

We reject the concept that elective public office is only for the rich. Yet the difficulties experienced by those who are not independently wealthy and desire to enter public service are annually compounded by the increasing cost of political campaigns. Without large financial resources of his own, faced with the practical problem of amassing a large campaign fund from thousands of small contributions, the prospective officeholder must either forget his laudable ambition or turn to the "fat cats" to gain his backing. In either case, the public loses; political competition is decreased or the danger of special interest representation is increased.

PROTECT POLITICAL DEBATE

The essence of the American political system is the presentation of alternatives through political debate. We subsidize our magazines and newspapers as a matter of public policy on the theory that the dissemination of information and ideas will assist in educating our citizens on the issues of the time. Surely it is of equal if not greater importance to insure that the principals in the arena of political debate are not left to beg for a hearing.

Salesmanship, not statesmanship, has become the prime prerequisite of a candidate seeking office today. He must merchandise himself to those with funds to back him before he can appear before the voters through the costly media which technology and population expansion have made essential.

What are the dangers involved in present campaign financing methods?

Today candidates for political office must frequently rely on large contributions provided by a few donors. The Senate Subcommittee on Elections found that, in the 1956 elections, a fraction of 1 percent of the American people provided the $33,185,725 which was the total for which the committee could account. One family, the du Ponts, gave more than the total of contributions from 13 Southern States.

DOES MONEY BUY ACCESS?

If large campaign contributions do not involve a quid pro quo, they certainly are directly connected with the question of "access" to the politically successful recipient. Prof. Alexander Heard states the case well when he declared in his 1956 study of this topic that—

> The number of cold bargains that are struck for campaign funds are negligible. The real influence derived from big contributions is a latent one, exercised through access—large contributions pave a sure road to the decision-making centers of government for those who want to present their case, which is often all they need.

"One man, one vote" becomes only an unrealistic textbook phrase when money can buy entree. In a free country no responsible party should have to keep one eye on the bank balance while drawing up its platform program for America. Democrats should feel at ease to disagree with labor unions. Republicans ought to be able to challenge the ideas of utility and oil companies.

Political exchequers of unequal size are inconsistent with the theme of political equality. The Senate Subcommittee on Elections found that in 1956 reported campaign contributions totaled $20,685,376 for Republican candidates and $10,977,790 for Democratic candidates.

MONEY CREATES INEQUALITY

In a country of untrammeled opportunity, we cannot expect equality of character, integrity, and ideas between candidates. Furthermore, there are subjective qualities rarely capable of tangible measurement. But disproportion in money is something else. Can public office be bought? Should it be bought?

As financial costs of campaigning increase and communication technology advances, individual participation in the process tends to decrease. Voters increasingly tend to believe that, without a money bag in their hand, their ideas will go unheard in the politician's office. Prospective candidates view the great disparity between campaign costs and salary and decide that the ratio rules out running for public office; the vast volume of small contributions needed to finance the race may make collection costs prohibitive, and unless he is independently wealthy, or has rich backers, his ambition must be relinquished.

FEDERAL PARTICIPATION ESSENTIAL

Mr. President, I have proposed five ways to meet essential costs of our national election campaigns from public funds. They are:

First. Government-paid television and radio time for presidential tickets and congressional candidates.

Second. A reasonable amount of public funds to help meet other legitimate campaign costs, such as travel, printing, and office rent.

Third. Federal matching funds for State voters' pamphlets, such as my own State of Oregon sends to every registered voter, in which space is given equally for information about all candidates and ballot measures.

Fourth. A Federal income tax credit for one small political contribution each year to aid in private fund-raising efforts such as that of the American Heritage Foundation.

Fifth. Creation of an independent agency to administer Federal election laws.

ENABLE REALISTIC APPROACH

Once the principle of public assumption of much of the cost of public access to candidates and their views is accepted, and the necessary burden of collecting campaign funds correspondingly reduced, it will become possible for the first time to deal realistically with controls of the evils of large private contributions and excessive expenditures. Withholding of the public funds, or loss of the privilege of tax credit, would be far more effective deterrents than unenforceable criminal penalties for evasion of reasonable limits. Also, the knowledge of access to at least a fair minimum of campaign costs from public funds will free candidates to make a virtue of compliance, and will make excessive expenditures from large private contributions unacceptable to the public and unprofitable to candidates.

FOUR BENEFITS POSSIBLE

I believe that the overall impact of this program would be to—

Give the public a more nearly equal opportunity to see and judge competing candidates for public office and their platforms and programs.

Eliminate the unhealthy and undemocratic significance of candidates' dependence on large campaign contributions.

Make a virtue of staying within the prescribed normal limits in the competitive use for the expensive modern media and techniques of campaigning, which have driven the cost of running for public office out of sight for the average citizen without large financial support—and thus to reduce excessive spending.

Display more clearly the nature of the support of candidates, insofar as individuals and groups are limited in making contributions to political candidates or committees and thus driven to participate openly in campaigns in their own names.

No tinkering with regulatory laws will reform the evil of dependence on large campaign contributions until the heavy inevitable costs of bringing a modern election campaign to the public's attention is borne in part by the public itself. No reform could be a better investment in the democratic process which is our greatest national pride.

WOULD CREATE ELECTION OFFICE

Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to carry out the reforms which I have advocated here today.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 2823) to provide for Federal contribution to the cost of election campaigns of candidates for Federal offices, conditioned upon effective control and publication of other sources of financing such campaigns; to encourage small individual campaign contributions and to reduce the importance of large contributions in Federal elections; to provide Federal financial assistance for State voters' and campaign pamphlets; and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. NEUBERGER was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

Mr. NEUBERGER. My proposal would establish in the Federal Government the Office of Election Finance, to be administered by a Director appointed by the President, with the consent of the Senate.

The Director would hold office for a period of 15 years, but could be removed at any time by concurrent resolution of Congress.

Responsibility of the Director would be to implement provisions for Federal reporting and Federal financing contained in my bill.

The bill provides that any legitimate candidate for nomination or election to a Federal elective office is entitled to receive one-half of the cost of broadcast time purchased for use in the campaign.

However, such broadcast time could not exceed a total of 30 minutes on radio and a total of 15 minutes on television in a primary election campaign; amounts of time would be doubled for general elections. To qualify for a Federal contribution, the candidate could not purchase additional broadcast time in excess of the amount to which the Federal contribution applies.

SYSTEM OF CHECKS PROVIDED

Government payments would apply to facilities, or combinations of facilities, necessary to cover the State or congressional district in which the candidate is seeking nomination or election.

Candidates would also be entitled to receive an amount, not to exceed 5 cents multiplied by the average vote in the State or congressional district in the last two elections for the same office, for payment of cost of printing, films, recordings, advertising space, broadcast time, office rent, equipment and supplies, postage, telephone service, telegrams, and transportation directly connected with his campaign.

The bill would establish a system of checks on all candidates. All candidates would be required to post a bond equal to one-half of the Federal contribution for which application is made. Should the candidate receive less than 10 percent of the total number of votes cast for all candidates, the bond would be forfeited.

The bill would authorize payment to any State preparing and distributing a voter's pamphlet to registered voters a sum equal to one-half of the net cost, plus a $10 tax credit for political contributions.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there appear at the conclusion of my remarks the text of my bill together with, first, textual and tabular materials dealing with major party expenditures in presidential elections since 1860, second, the minor party vote in national elections, and third, State published publicity pamphlets in election campaigns.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

DUAL STANDARD EMPLOYED

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, in my opinion, the Government should finance political campaigns. Men and women ought not to enter high office obligated to private contributors, be they in big business or in labor unions.

We would not think of permitting corporations or unions to pay the salaries of our public officials. Why, then, allow them to provide their campaign treasuries?

Today as much as $200 million may be spent in a single national election. We get excited about a public official accepting a deepfreeze or vicuna coat, but we are indifferent to the acceptance of millions of dollars in campaign contributions.

This is why I think candidates should get their campaign funds from the same source from which their salary will be paid if they are victorious—from the Public Treasury.

Some taxpayers may worry about the sums involved. These sums are trivial compared to the savings which will result if men and women can enter office without being fettered to special interest and private factions. Puerto Rico has public financing of its political campaigns. Governor Muñoz has told me that it had meant a rebirth of true political freedom in that island realm.

COST ACTUALLY LESS

And as the distinguished senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] pointed out in an extremely cogent article in the Atlantic Monthly:

> The people now pay, after an election, many times over, the actual costs of the campaign. As we have seen, the big contirbutors make huge profits as a group upon their investment in both the candidates and parties. For the people, it would be far cheaper if the Government met the costs of the campaign, since then the elected officials and parties would not be under obligation to the big contributors.

Mr. President, I believe that the approach which I have outlined moves in the direction in which we can expect to accomplish real reform in campaign spending. It presents definite problems of implementation, but I do not think that they are problems which cannot be resolved. I hope that the Senate will hold hearings on my proposal so that this idea may be explored in detail.

NEW APPROACH REQUIRED

The direction in which I have suggested that we move in the area of campaign spending legislation is a definite departure from the concepts we have attempted to employ since passage of the first corrupt practices legislation in 1870. As Theodore Roosevelt noted in 1907:

> It will take some time for people so to familiarize themselves with such a proposal as to be willing to consider its adoption.

Therefore, I do not intend to offer my bill as an amendment. But I urge my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to join me in support of this idea, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill I have introduced today remain at the desk for 1 week so that Senators wishing to add their names as consponsors may do so.

We cannot claim to the American people that we have materially advanced the cause of "clean elections" by passage of the bill before us today, even with adoption of suggested amendments. It is the system which must be changed. The independence of the most honest person on earth can be imperiled by multi-million-dollar political campaigns. That is why I am introducing this bill today—to make it possible for people who are independent and honest, by nature, to exercise those qualities as they think best in the public interest. I know of no other adequate way to free candidates from the fetters of big contributions than to have the Federal Government take a major role in the financing of Federal election campaigns.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there appear at the end of my remarks an article by George Meany, president of the AFL–CIO, endorsing my proposal for Government financing of campaigns for Federal office, and a news story reporting former President Harry S. Truman's support for the principle of Federal funds for presidential campaigns.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Federal Fair Election Finance Act of 1959".

Statement of findings and purposes

SEC. 2. Congress finds that it is in the national interest that voters in elections for Federal offices should have opportunities to judge competing candidates and their programs on fair and equal terms before choosing between them, and that the dominant importance of large, private campaign contributions should be eliminated from such Federal elections.

Free and untrammeled representation of the public interest is possible only when men and women in high Federal office are not indebted for large financial campaign gifts to private donors who feel a special interest in the election results.

Disproportionate inequality among candidates, with respect to campaign financing, imperils the democratic premises of free and informed choices by the citizen, particularly in an era when access to the most compelling media of public information is increasingly decisive and costly.

Government contributions to the essential costs of major election campaigns as recommended in 1907 by the then President of the United States, in direct partial assumption of certain costs and in tax incentives for small, individual contributions, offer the most effective means to assure citizens of exercising their choice of government on fair and equal terms, to prevent private persons and groups of great wealth from unduly influencing the conditions of that choice, and to eliminate the undesirable and undemocratic significance of candidates' dependence on large, private campaign gifts.

Definitions

SEC. 3. As used in this Act, unless the context otherwise indicates—

(1) The term "candidate" means a person who has met qualifications necessary to have his name presented on the ballot in any election for nomination for, or election to, a Federal elective office, and who is legally qualified to serve if elected; but only while the person remains eligible for the election in question, and provided he does not publicly deny or withdraw his candidacy.

(2) The term "election" means a regular, special, general, or primary election for Federal elective office, with respect to which the names of two or more candidates for nomination or election to the office have been and remain qualified for presentation on the ballot, and including the election of a slate of presidential electors by votes cast for the names of candidates for President and Vice President and including a presidential preference primary, but does not include a convention of a political party or a caucus held for the purpose of nominating candidates, or the vote of the electoral college.

(3) The term "Federal elective office" means the offices of President or Vice President, or Senator or Representative in, or Delegate or Resident Commissioner to, the Congress of the United States.

(4) The term "financial agent" means a campaign manager, party official, committee chairman, treasurer, or any other individual publicly designated by the candidate as his authorized agent with responsibility, along with the candidate, for all financial arrangements, receipts, disbursements, reports, certificates, accounts, and other transactions of the candidate's election campaign.

(5) The term "Director" means the Director of Election Finance provided for by title III of this Act.

(6) The term "State" includes also any Territory, District, Commonwealth, or other area in which an election may take place.

(7) Terms defined in the Federal Corrupt Practices Act, 1925, shall have the meaning assigned to them in that Act.

TITLE I—FEDERAL CONTRIBUTION TO ELECTION FINANCE

Election finance fund

SEC. 101. The Director of Election Finance is authorized to make payments toward meeting election campaign expenses incurred by or on behalf of any candidate in an election in the manner and subject to the conditions hereinafter set forth. For this purpose there shall be established in the Treasury an Election Finance Fund, administered by the Director, to which appropriations shall be made for disbursements under the authority of this Act.

Federal contribution to broadcast time

SEC. 102. (a) Upon application by or on behalf of a candidate in an election, accompanied by duly authenticated bills or vouchers, the Director is authorized to pay to licensees under the Communications Act of 1934 one-half of the cost of broadcast time purchased for use in the candidate's election campaign, not exceeding a total of 30 minutes on radio and a total of 15 minutes on television in a primary election campaign, and not exceeding a total of 60 minutes on radio and a total of 30 minutes on television in a general election campaign, over each of such facilities or combinations of facilities as may be necessary to cover the State or congressional district within which the candidate is seeking election. The selection of broadcast facilities, times, and materials shall remain completely beyond any control, interference, or influence of the Director.

(b) To qualify for a Federal contribution to broadcast time under this section, the application shall certify, in addition to compliance with the other conditions required under this Act, that there will not be purchased or used in the candidate's election campaign, in his name, with his participation, or by any person, committee, or organization associated with his campaign or under his control, additional broadcast time more than equal to the maximum total amounts of broadcast time for which Federal contribution is allowable under subsection (a) hereof.

Federal contribution to general expenditures—Formula

SEC. 103. (a) Upon application by or on behalf of a candidate in an election, accompanied by duly authenticated bills or vouchers, the Director is authorized to make payments for expenses incurred in the candidate's election campaign, in a total amount not exceeding 5 cents multiplied by the average vote in the State or congressional district for the contested office, as determined under subsection (b) hereof. The objects of such payments may include, but are not limited to, expenditures for printing or other reproduction of campaign materials, films, and recordings, advertising, space or facilities, broadcast time, office rent, equipment and supplies, postage, telephone service and telegrams, and the candidate's own transportation, hotel, and other travel expenses; but they shall not include payments to any individual for personal political activities. Payments may be made directly on the bills or vouchers submitted or, if these have already been paid from other campaign funds, by reimbursement to the candidate's financial agent.

(b) For every contested election for which a request for Federal contribution has been made, the Director shall determine and declare the average vote, for the purposes of this section, in accordance with the first applicable of the following computations:

(1) The average of the total vote cast in each of the last two elections for all candidates for the same nomination for, or for election to, the office.

(2) If there has been only one prior such election, the total vote then cast for all such candidates.

(3) If there has been no prior election for the same nomination for, or for election to, the office, the number of voters registered or otherwise actually eligible to vote in the particular contested election for which the request is made.

In presidential elections, including preference primaries, each person voting shall be considered to have cast a single vote for a candidate for President, irrespective of the number of electors or delegates to be elected.

(c) Payments under this section shall be made currently as bills or vouchers for expenditures in a candidate's election campaign are submitted, accompanied by all necessary certificates in compliance with conditions and regulations under this Act, and verified; but not more than two-thirds of the total amount of Federal contribution to a candidate's election campaign allowable under this section shall be paid prior to the election. The balance shall be payable only upon completion and review of all reports required by law or regulation concerning election finances, and upon a determination by the Director of compliance with all requirements and conditions under this Act.

General conditions for Federal contributions

SEC. 104. (a) Any application for a Federal contribution under this title shall be accompanied by—

(1) Designation by the candidate of a financial agent within the State or congressional district;

(2) A certificate that there will not be expended in the candidate's election campaign by the candidate, with his participation or consent, by his financial agent, or by any person, committee or organization associated with his campaign or under his control, funds from private sources in a total amount more than equal to the maximum total amount of the Federal contribution allowable under the provisions of this title;

(3) A certificate that there has not been and will not be accepted or used in the candidate's election campaign by the candidate, by his financial agent, or by any person, committee, or organization associated with his campaign or under his control, any gift, loan, or other contribution of money or property, exceeding $100 from any individual;

(4) A bond in an amount equal to one-half the amount of Federal contribution under this title for which application is made, payable to the United States and conditioned upon the candidate's receiving in the election not less than 10 per centum of the total number of votes cast for all candidates for the same nomination for, or for election to, the office;

(5) A certificate that within 30 days after the election there will be filed with the Office of Election Finance a complete and accurate report showing compliance with applicable law and regulations and containing an account, in such detail as the Director may by regulation prescribe, of all contributions, both Federal and private, and all expenditures made in the candidate's election campaign; and payment of any Federal contribution shall be conditional upon compliance with the certificates submitted.

(b) Applications for Federal contribution may be signed either by the candidate or by his financial agent. All certificates, reports, affidavits, or other undertakings or statements of fact which may be required under this Act shall be signed by the candidate's financial agent and by the candidate, except that the signature of candidates for President or Vice President shall not be required.

SEC. 105. Upon a determination by the Director that there has occurred, in a candidate's election campaign for which Federal contribution has been allowed under this title, any expenditure or contribution from private sources in excess of the limits required to be certified under section 102(b), 104(a)(2), or 104(a)(3) hereof, the total allowable amount of Federal contribution shall be reduced by the amount of the excess expenditure or contribution. The United States shall be entitled to recover from the candidate or from his financial agent the amount of any Federal contribution already paid in excess of the amount remaining allowable under this section, with court costs, in a civil suit brought by the Director in any court of competent jurisdiction.

TITLE II—STATE VOTERS' PAMPHLETS—FEDERAL CONTRIBUTION

SEC. 201. (a) There are authorized to be appropriated, to be expended as provided in this section, such amounts as may be necessary to pay one-half the net cost incurred by any State in preparing, printing, delivering, and distributing to each registered voter State voters' pamphlets for any election at which candidates for any Federal office are to be nominated or elected.

(b) To qualify for a Federal contribution under this section, a State voters' pamphlet must be found by the Director to—

(1) be an official publication issued by or under the control and supervision of, and in the name of, an agency of a State;

(2) be distributed free of cost to every registered voter in the State; and

(3) make available information about, or space for presenting statements of program or of support, pictures, or other election campaign information about, all candidates for the same office on equal terms and under equal conditions.

SEC. 202. (a) The Director of Election Finance shall make annual estimates of the amounts to be paid to any State under this title, based on reports filed by the highest State official responsible for the State voters' pamphlet and containing his estimates of the net cost required to be incurred for such pamphlets during the next year, and shall certify such amounts to the Secretary of the Treasury.

(b) The Secretary of the Treasury shall, through the Division of Disbursement of the Treasury Department and prior to audit or settlement by the General Accounting Office, pay to each State the amounts certified to him by the Director to be necessary for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this title, subject to the conditions that the use of such amounts shall be properly accounted for, and any part of such amounts not needed shall be returned to the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 203. Official State voters' pamphlets referred to in this section, when designated as such by the responsible State agency, shall be free of postage, whether transmitted individually or in bulk, in the United States mails.

TITLE III—OFFICE OF ELECTION FINANCE—AUTHORITY AND GENERAL PROVISIONS

Office and personnel

SEC. 301. There is created an establishment of the Government to be known as the Office of Election Finance, independent of the executive branch of the Government.

SEC. 302. (a) The Office of Election Finance shall be under the control and direction of a Director of Election Finance, assisted by a Deputy Director of Election Finance, both of whom shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice of the Senate, and who shall receive basic compensation at the rate of $22,500 and $20,500, respectively.

(b) The Deputy Director of Election Finance shall perform such duties as may be assigned to him by the Director, and during the absence or incapacity of the Director, or during a vacancy in that office, shall act as Director. The Director shall designate an employee of the office to act as Director during the absence or incapacity of, or during a vacancy in the offices of, both the Director and the Deputy Director.

SEC. 303. (a) Except as hereinafter provided in this section, the Director and the Deputy Director shall hold office for fifteen years and shall not be eligible for reappointment. The Director or the Deputy Director may be removed at any time by concurrent resolution of Congress, after notice and hearing, when in the judgment of Congress, the Director or Deputy Director has become permanently incapacitated or has been inefficient or guilty of neglect of duty or of malfeasance in office, or of any felony or conduct involving moral turpitude, and for no other cause and in no other manner except by impeachment. Any Director or Deputy Director removed in the manner provided in this section shall be ineligible for reappointment to that office. When a Director or Deputy Director attains the age of seventy years, he shall be retired from his office.

(b) Any Director who shall be so retired for age after serving at least ten years in his office, or who completes his term, shall receive an annuity during the remainder of his life equal to two-thirds of the salary payable for his office at the time of retirement or completion of term, except that the annuity of any Director who completes his term shall be reduced by one-fourth of 1 per centum for each full month he is under the age of sixty-five at such completion. Any Director who becomes permanently disabled from performing his duties shall be retired and shall receive an annuity during the remainder of his life equal to two-thirds of the salary payable for his office at the time of retirement if he has served at least ten years therein or equal to one-half of such salary if he has served less than ten years. The annuities provided for herein shall be paid by the Office of Election Finance. No person receiving benefits under this section shall receive any other retirement benefits under any other law of the United States.

SEC. 304. The Director shall in accordance with the civil service laws and the Classification Act of 1949, as amended, appoint and fix the compensation of such other officers and employees as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act.

SEC. 305. All laws relating generally to the administration of the departments and establishments shall, so far as applicable, govern the Office of Election Finance. Books or records of account or minutes of proceedings of the Office, and properly authenticated copies or transcripts of any books, records, papers, or documents of the Office, shall be admitted as evidence with the same effect as the books, records, and minutes and the copies and transcripts referred to in section 1733 of title 28, United States Code.

Regulations, enforcement, and penalties

SEC. 306. The Director is authorized to promulgate such regulations as he finds necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act; and he may issue official schedules and forms for filing applications, certificates, affidavits, proof of election campaign contributions, receipts, expenditures, or other transactions, reports, accounts, bonds, or other documents which may be required by law or by regulations hereunder.

SEC. 307. All regulations, rules, orders, or determinations under this Act shall be made, and shall be judicially reviewable, in accordance with the provisions of the Administrative Procedure Act.

Investigations and reports

SEC. 308. The Office of Election Finance shall make from time to time thorough audits and field investigations with respect to election campaign contributions and expenditures to which this Act or the Federal Corrupt Practices Act, 1925, is applicable, to statements filed under the provisions of these Acts, and to alleged failure to file any statement required under the provisions of these Acts. On the request of the Director of Election Finance, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, with the consent of the Attorney General, and the General Accounting Office, with the consent of the Comptroller General, are authorized to render such assistance as the Director may require in any instance to carry out an audit or investigation under this section in a complete and effective manner.

SEC. 309. The Director shall make an annual general report, and from time to time such particular reports as may be appropriate, all of which shall be public, concerning operations under this Act, to the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives, and, in instances involving possible violation of law, to the Attorney General.

Penalties or enforcement

SEC. 310. (a) No candidate, financial agent, or other person shall apply for or use any part of any funds which may be obtained under this Act in the form of a Federal contribution or private contributions entitled to Federal tax credit, except in compliance with all applicable regulations, certificates and other conditions required under this Act. Violation of this section by any person, committee, or organization associated with a candidate's campaign with his consent, or under his control, shall also be a violation by the candidate's financial agent and by the candidate, with the exception of candidates for President or Vice President.

(b) Any violation of this section, including the filing of any false certificate, report, account, or other statement concerning a candidate's election finance required by law or regulation, or the failure to file any such statement so required, shall be punishable by a fine of not more than $5,000 or imprisonment for not more than two years, or both.

SEC. 311. Federal contributions to a candidate's election campaign expenses under title I of this Act shall not be considered for the purpose of limitations on campaign contributions and expenditures fixed in the Federal Corrupt Practices Act, 1925.

Appropriations

SEC. 312. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as are necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act.

TITLE IV—INCOME TAX CREDIT FOR POLITICAL CONTRIBUTIONS

Amendments to Internal Revenue Code of 1954

SEC. 401. (a) Part IV of subchapter A of chapter 1 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to credits against tax) is amended by renumbering section 38 as 39, and by inserting after section 37 the following new section:

"SEC. 38. Contributions to political parties and candidates.

"(a) General Rule.—In the case of an individual over 18 years of age, there shall be allowed as a credit against the tax imposed by this chapter for the taxable year an amount, up to a maximum of $10, equal to any contributions of money made by the individual to a National or State organization which is recognized under the laws of any State as a political party for the purpose of nominating candidates for presentation on an election ballot in any State, or to a candidate or a candidate's financial agent as such terms are defined in section 3 of the Fair Election Finance Act of 1959.

"(b) Limitations.—

"(1) Application with other credits.—The credit allowed by subsection (a) shall not exceed the amount of the tax imposed by this chapter for the taxable year reduced by the sum of the credits allowable under section 33 (relating to foreign tax credit), section 34 (relating to credit for dividends received by individuals), section 35 (relating to partially tax exempt interest), and section 37 (relating to retirement income).

"(2) Verification.—The credit under subsection (a) shall be allowed, with respect to any political contribution, only if the taxpayer submits with his return for the taxable year a receipt or other verification prescribed by the Director of Election Finance under section 403 of the Federal Fair Election Finance Act and which for purposes of this title shall be considered a part of the taxpayer's return for the taxable year.

"(c) Cross Reference.—

"For disallowance of credit to estates and trusts, see section 642(a)(4)."

(b) The table of sections for part IV of subchapter A of chapter 1 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 is amended by striking out:

"SEC. 38. Overpayments of tax."

and inserting in lieu thereof

"SEC. 38. Contributions to political parties and candidates.

"SEC. 39. Overpayments of tax."

(c) Section 642(a) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to credits against tax for estates and trusts) is amended by adding at the end thereof a new paragraph as follows:

"(4) Political contributions.—An estate or trust shall not be allowed the credit against tax for political contributions provided by section 38."

SEC. 402. The amendments to the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 made by this title shall apply to taxable years ending on or after the date of the enactment of this Act, but only with respect to contributions made on or after such date.

SEC. 403. (a) The Director of Election Finance shall, after consultation with the Secretary of Treasury, prepare, prescribe, and issue a form or forms of receipt or other verification of individual political contribution qualifying for tax credit under section 38 of IRC of 1954 (as added by section 401 of this Act) which will conveniently and inexpensively—

(1) assure that tax credit for a contribution may only be claimed by and allowed to the actual contributor, and protect against transfer of the privilege of tax credit to a person other than the actual contributor;

(2) facilitate the verification requirements prescribed by section 38 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (as added by section 401 of this Act); and

(3) provide a record by which recipients can account for and report contributions for which tax credit may be claimed by the contributor.

(b) The Director of Election Finance and the Secretary of the Treasury shall publish annually a joint report stating as accurately as may be practicable, based upon available records, reports of recipients of political contributions, and estimates, the total amount of contributions made for which tax credit could be claimed, and the total amount of tax credit so claimed and allowed under the provisions of this title.

1. Figures from 1860 through 1924 are taken from Odegard, Peter H. and E. Allen Helms, "American Politics: A Study in Political Dynamics." New York, Harpers, 1938. p. 643. The authors explain that the sums shown are national committee expenditures only and "must be heavily discounted for the years prior to 1912."

2. Figures from 1928 through 1948 are taken from Bone, Hugh A. "American Politics and the Party System." New York, McGraw-Hill, 1949. p. 622. These sums are listed as national committee expenditures only.

3. The 1952 totals are for the national committees only, and they mean very little as far as total campaign expenditures are concerned. They are taken from the Congressional Quarterly Weekly Report, Oct. 2, 1953. This publication further states that the Republicans spent $13,814,997 on the presidential and congressional campaigns and that the Democrats spent $6,159,844 in an attempt to win these offices. By law, no single committee can spend more than $3,000,000 in campaign funds in any single year. This has led to the formation of many special groups, such as Citizens for Eisenhower and Volunteers for Stevenson; and an exact sum spent on a presidential campaign is now regarded as virtually impossible to obtain.

4. The 1956 totals are for the national committees only They are taken from the Congressional Quarterly Almanac, 1957. This publication further states that the Republican Party reported spending $20,685,387 from Jan. 1 through Nov. 30, for 1956 general political activity, or 62.3 percent of total spending and the Democratic Party reported 1956 political spending of $10,977,790, or 33.1 percent of the total spending reported.

Primary election pamphlets

Statement by candidate: Any candidate and the friends of any candidate for nomination to any State or district office may file with the secretary of state, for publication, not later than the 70th day before the primary, his portrait cut and a signed statement containing the reasons why he should be nominated. He shall be allotted one page of printed matter (sec. 255.030).

Statement by adversary: Any persons opposing the nomination of such candidate may, not later than the 70th day before the primary, file with the secretary of state their signed statement, accompanied by proof, by affidavit, or sheriff's return, that they have caused a true copy of the statement to be served upon such candidate in person. They shall be allotted one page of printed matter (sec. 255.030).

Material excluded: No statement for or against a candidate shall be accepted for printing in the pamphlet which contains vulgar, obscene, scandalous, libelous, or defamatory matter, or language advocating or inciting hatred or ridiculing any person or group because of race, color, or religion, or language or matter prohibited by congress (sec. 255.040).

Political parties: A separate pamphlet shall be printed for each political party (sec. 255.050(3)).

Distribution: At least 20 days before the primary the secretary of state shall mail to every voter who registered as a member of one of the political parties required to nominate their candidates by primary, a copy of the pamphlet (sec. 255.060).

Allotment of space and cost: Each candidate who has filed his statement shall pay for at least 1 page of space as follows: (1) U.S. Senator, Representative in Congress, Governor, secretary of state, State treasurer, each $100; (2) Justice of the Supreme Court, superintendent of public instruction, Attorney General, each $75; (3) Commissioner of Labor, circuit judge, district attorney, each $50; (4) senator or representative in the legislative assembly, each $10; (5) any other office for a district consisting of one or more counties, or State office, each $25. Any candidate may have additional space for $100 per page (sec. 255.070).

General election pamphlets

Statements: Not later than the 70th day before the general election, the State executive committee of a political party (and independent candidates) may file with the secretary of state portrait cuts of its candidates and statements and arguments for its candidates and against candidates of all other parties. No cuts or statements shall be filed in behalf of a candidate who is the sole nominee for any office (sec. 255.210).

Matter excluded: Same as in primary election pamphlet (sec. 255.220).

Authority: In the foot margin of every page in the pamphlet shall be shown the authority for the statements contained therein (sec. 255.240).

Allotment of space and costs: All portrait cuts and statements of all the political parties and independent candidates shall be bound together in one pamphlet. No political party shall have more than 24 pages, nor an independent candidate more than 2 pages. Payment shall be at the rate of $50 per page. Space devoted to candidates for the legislature, in addition to the 24 pages used by political parties, shall be $10 per page and no more than 1 page shall be allowed to each candidate (sec. 255.250). Candidates for the U.S. Senate or for Representatives in Congress may have 4 extra pages at $100 per page (sec. 255.260).

Distribution: The secretary of state shall mail a pamphlet to each registered voter in the State on or before the 20th day before the election (sec. 255.230).

President and Vice President

Primary: Candidates for President and Vice President may use not more than four pages of space in the pamphlet of their political party, at $100 per page. Any elector of his party who opposes his nomination may have four pages at the same rates (sec. 255.080).

Candidates for delegates to a national nominating convention and for nomination as presidential elector may have one page in their party's primary election pamphlet for $50, and not exceeding three additional pages at $100 each (sec. 255.090).

General election pamphlet: Candidates regularly nominated by a political party for President and Vice President may have four pages without charge (sec. 255.260).

Voting information: All pamphlets, both primary and general election pamphlets, shall contain (1) voting qualifications, (2) information as to reregistration, (3) absentee ballot information, and (4) registration information (sec. 255.025).

Specifications: All pamphlets shall be 6 x 9 inches in size and shall be printed in specified type (sec. 255.060 (3)).

Primary and general election pamphlets

Statement by candidate: Not less than 30 days before the primary or general election, any candidate for nomination or election to the office of President or Vice President of the United States, United States Senator, United States Representative or for Governor, or any other State office, may file with the secretary of state, a portrait cut of a candidate with a typewritten statement setting forth the reasons why such candidate should be nominated or elected (sec. 34–106).

Material excluded: The secretary of state shall submit said material to the attorney general who shall reject any statement or other matters which contain any obscene, vulgar, profane, scandalous, libelous, or defamatory matter or any language which in any way incites, counsels, promotes or advocates hatred, abuse, violence, or hostility toward or which tends to cast ridicule or shame upon any person or group of persons by reason of race, color, or creed, the circulation of which through the mails is prohibited by Congress or other statement which in his opinion would be defamatory in its application. No candidate is entitled to display in the pamphlet any cut showing the uniform or insignia of any organization which advocates or teaches racial or religious intolerance (sec. 34–108).

Distribution: Not more than 20 days before an election, the Secretary of State shall transmit to the auditors of the several counties of the State, sufficient copies of such pamphlet for every legal voter upon the registration of the respective counties, and such auditor shall, immediately thereafter, transmit by mail with postage fully prepaid, to every voter in his county whose address he may have, one copy of such pamphlet (sec. 34–111).

Allotment of space and cost: No candidate shall be allowed more than 2 pages in said booklet for any election, and he shall pay in advance the sum of $150 per page (sec. 34–107).

Specifications: The secretary of state shall the power to make reasonable regulations as to the filing, the acceptance and redemption of certain materials, and the arranging thereof in the booklet (sec. 34–109). He shall cause all the copies and statements relating to one election to be joined in a pamphlet. All the printing shall be done by the State as provided by law, and the pages of said pamphlet shall be numbered consecutively from 1 to the end, and shall be 6 by 9 inches in size, and the printed matter therein shall be set in 8-point Roman-faced solid type of not to exceed 9-point body in 2 columns of 13 ems in width each to the page with 6-point dividing rule with the appropriate headings and printed on a good quality of paper 25 by 38 inches, weighing not more than 50 pounds to the ream (sec. 34–110).

MONTANA

Section 94–1428, Rev. Code, 1947, contains the following provision: "No sums of money shall be paid * * * by any candidate who has received the nomination to any public office * * * in this State, except such as he may contribute toward payment for his political party's or independent statement in the pamphlet herein provided for * * * in excess of * * *" Section 94–1427 exempts from limitation expenses which candidate may pay "to the State for printing, as herein provided" in his campaign for nomination.

[The pamphlet herein referred to was authorized by secs. 6 and 7, initiated by act of November 1912; these sections were repealed by act of March 3, 1919, c. 88, laws 1919.]

Specifications: All pamphlets shall be 6 by 9 inches in size and shall be printed in specified type (sec. 16–1907).

Statements for the same office shall be published on successive pages and shall be arranged alphabetically; and all statements filed for or against all the candidates for nomination to each office shall be printed in the order in which the names of the candidates are grouped on the ballot (sec. 16–1906).

[From the American Federationist, April 1956]

THE LOBBY PROBE

(By George Meany)

A special Senate committee has been authorized to undertake a full-scale investigation of political contributions by big business. This investigation was touched off by sensational disclosures regarding the lobbying activities of gas and oil interests. President Eisenhower found these activities so reprehensible that he vetoed the bill freeing natural gas producers from Federal price regulation on that very account.

The AFL–CIO heartily supports this Senate investigation. Despite the law forbidding political contributions by corporations, it is common knowledge in Washington that big business interests have financed political campaigns of individual candidates and political organizations through various legal loopholes.

Frequently these contributions have been made in the name of corporation executives and members of their family. It was not until Senator FRANCIS CASE of South Dakota told the Senate he had been offered a $2,500 campaign contribution by a lawyer representing a gas producer, in the expectation that the Senator would vote for the bill desired by the gas lobby, that the scandalous nature of big business influence upon the legislative process was brought forcibly to public attention.

Since the Senate investigation was authorized, it has been stated in the press that the committee would inquire into political contributions by labor organizations as well as big business. One of the committee members, Senator BARRY GOLDWATER, of Arizona, has publicly announced that he will insist that the investigation be broadened to include unions.

Labor welcomes such an investigation. The AFL–CIO, in accordance with the law, files with Congress a complete record of all funds it receives in $1 voluntary political contributions from its members and all expenditures from those funds. There is nothing secret in these activities, which are completely open and aboveboard.

Before the merger both the AFL and CIO maintained separate political committees which collected campaign contributions from members and made expenditures in behalf of candidates from both parties who received labor endorsements. Since the merger the AFL–CIO has established the committee on political education to carry on the same work.

We are proud of the records of these committees. With the help of State organizations, they have endorsed candidates for public office with outstanding records of public service.

Perhaps an attempt will be made to indicate that labor's campaign contributions to candidates, in the aggregate, matched those of business contributors. Such efforts will be doomed to failure, because the fact is that labor has never succeeded in raising by voluntary contributions more than a small fraction of the total amounts expended in any campaign.

It is to the best interests of democracy that the cost of campaigns be financed by as many voters as possible, because this helps to arouse the political consciousness and responsibility the great masses of the Amercican electorate. It is also obviously in the national interest to prevent a few large campaign contributors from dominating the selection and election of candidates for public office.

Might it not, therefore, be a good idea for Congress to provide by law for Government financing of campaign for Federal office, as proposed in S. 3242, a bill introduced by Senator RICHARD NEUBERGER and cosponsored by Senators MORSE, MURRAY, DOUGLAS, SPARKMAN, MANSFIELD, LANGER, and HUMPHREY? If Congress refuses to adopt such a law, might it not then consider limiting all campaign contributions to a maximum of $1.

TRUMAN URGES ELECTION SUBSIDIES—CAMPAIGN HELP WOULD CUT GRAFT

Former President Harry S. Truman said Tuesday that he favors Government subsidies for presidential campaigns because "it takes some of the graft and corruption out of it."

Mr. Truman, in Chicago to address the American Legion's national convention Wednesday, explained that what he meant by "graft and corruption" was that special interests have been subsidizing the Republicans recently.

But, he added, "they never gave us [the Democrats] any."

GOLDFINE ISSUE SEEN

Mr. Truman told a news conference in the Blackstone Hotel that he has no doubt that the Bernard Goldfine influence peddling case, involving Sherman Adams, Presidential aide, will be an issue in the congressional elections.

He also said that he hoped the Democrats weren't becoming overconfident.

"That's the worst possible disease," he said. "That was proved in 1948."

Mr. Truman referred to GOP hopes for their presidential candidate of that year, Thomas Dewey, former New York Governor.

Mr. Truman won that year.

PLEDGES ACTIVITY IN 1960

The ex-President promised he would be "just as active" in the 1960 presidential campaign "as this old man can act."

"I point to 1948 and I don't feel any older today," he added.

Mr. Truman was emphatic in his assertion that he doesn't intend to say anything critical of the Office of President or anyone occupying the Office.

"I'm not answering any questions that will reflect on the President of the United States," he told one newsman.

He said his refusal to attack President Eisenhower was based on his respect for the Office.

UPHOLDS 85TH CONGRESS

Asked for his opinion on the record of the recently closed 85th Congress, which set an all-time peacetime high for spending, Mr. Truman replied: "I'm satisfied with the record. I think it was a good one. A lot of people say that it was too much to spend to save the country."

Mr. Truman was reluctant to voice any opinions on how the current Far East crisis should be met.

Of the Red Chinese bombardment of Nationalist-held islands, he said: "The situation will have to be met."

He added, however, that Nationalist-held Formosa is "one of our frontlines of defense."

A MONUMENT TO MEXICAN INDEPENDENCE

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, it is an honor and a privilege for me to introduce, for appropriate reference, on behalf of myself and the Senator from Oregan [Mr. MORSE], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ], my colleague, the junior Senator from California [Mr. ENGLE], the Senator from Alaska [Mr. GRUENING], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD], and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], a bill which provides for honorable and tangible commemoration of the 150th anniversary of Mexican independence. By its terms, the Secretary of State is "requested and authorized to procure a monument appropriately commemorating the attainment of independence by Mexico, and present the same, on behalf of the people of the United States, to the people of Mexico."

Mr. President, it is altogether fitting that the people of the United States should mark this important occasion in Mexico's history by a suitable monument erected in the beautiful capital city of our great neighbor to the south. Through this symbolic object, the people of Mexico and the American visitor will be reminded of the common bond that unites us with our great good neighbor to the south. That bond is the love of freedom. While both Republics, the United States and Mexico, have moved steadily toward the objective of a Democratic society broadly based, politically mature, and responsive to the collective wills of the governed, the road to Mexican independence in bygone days was frequently mined, and many are the scars and pitfalls marking its evolutionary course.

In our Senate bill we seek to commemorate the first of what may be called the three major revolutions in Mexican history. This was the one that freed Mexico from Spain; and just as we celebrate the Fourth of July, so Mexico salutes those who threw off the iron band of colonial oppression. But the others, in the eyes of most Mexicans, should share the honored position. The second one occurred later in the 19th century, when Benito Juárez led the mestizo class to political power on a program of liberalism and anticlericalism. And the last one, which started in 1910, and is still going on, stood for land reform, gains for labor, and economic nationalism.

While Mexico is commonly thought of as the gateway to Central and South America, it is no less true that Mexico is the gateway from Latin America to the United States, and the broad influence of the one cannot fail to have its impact upon the other.

There can be no doubt that the spectacle of a burgeoning and prospering democracy to the north must have reacted powerfully on the aspirations and political theories of men in the Spanish colonies who did not find things to their mind. The freedom virus of the American and French Revolutions was in the air. It did not take long to spread.

The first serious movement toward separation from Spain was begun by Miguel Hidalgo y Costilla, the green-eyed, white-haired creole curate of the village of Dolores, in the Province of Guanojuato. Hidalgo, benevolent, scholarly, worldly, and shrewd, had more than once been in trouble with the Inquisition, for he harbored heretical views as well as political ideas born of the French Revolution. The revolt which he led took place on September 16, 1810. According to tradition, the launching of the movement was marked by the ringing of the bell of the Dolores church; and the uprising was given something of the fervor of a crusade by the fact that Hidalgo chose as his standard a sacred banner bearing the Virgin of Guadalupe. From the banner came the religious note in the battle cry, known as the Grito de Dolores: "Long live our Lady of Guadalupe. Long live independence." For a time the revolt spread rapidly, and gained a considerable creole following from those disgruntled over recent events. But by the following January, the rebels met with serious defeat; and a short time afterward Miguel Hidalgo, the father of Mexican independence, was captured, tried, and executed by a firing squad.

But the spark of freedom ignited by Hidalgo's rebels in 1810 could not quite be extinguished. The revolution was continued, however, by another priest, a Mestizo named José Maria Morelos, who had served under Hidalgo. Much of the country south of the capital fell under his control; and on November 6, 1813, a congress which he called at Chilpanango drew up a declaration of independence from Spain. The next year the gathering adopted a provisional constitution; but there was no opportunity to put it into effect, for the royalists rapidly gained control. Morelos was captured, given a speedy trial by the Inquisition, unfrocked, and condemned to death; and on December 22, 1815, he was, like his former leader, executed by a firing squad.

Not even these disasters could end the movement for independence, launched by Miguel Hidalgo. For the next 5 years, unorganized fighting of the guerrilla type continued in various parts of the country against the royal government. Independence from Spain was not realized until September 27, 1821, when revolutionary forces which had broken Spanish resistance in surrounding parts, entered Mexico City, under the leadership of Iturbide, who was enthusiastically hailed and received.

The diplomatic relations of the United States with Mexico may be said to have begun January 27, 1823, when, by the appointment of Mr. Joel R. Poinsett, as minister, the republic's independence was recognized. From that time to the present, there has been no period when our State Department has not been vitally interested, directly or indirectly, in our nearest Latin American neighbor.

Perhaps the most outstanding evidence of this interest occurred in the 19th century, when Mexico and the United States joined to keep this hemisphere free.

The time was the spring of 1864, a year of peril and crisis for both nations. Our country was torn by the War Between the States. In France, Napoleon III was busily organizing his project of a Mexican Empire for Maximilian. In London, Maximilian was being received incognito by Queen Victoria. And in Mexico, the struggling young Republic faced an uncertain future, as European determination to end its independence gained momentum.

It was in the midst of this hour of crisis that the United States and Mexico had to plan and act together. Both our Secretary of State, Seward, and the young Mexican Minister to the United States, Matías Romero, shared the objective of preventing a European power from establishing an empire in this hemisphere. Public opinion was solidly behind this objective.

During a dinner at the famed Delmonico's, in New York, called by influential private citizens to obtain support for the Mexican position, William E. Dodge, Jr., declared that—

> When our own civil war shall be over, there will not be a city, nor a town, nor a village which will not immediately arm a company of soldiers to fly to the aid of our sister Republic, now making so glorious a fight.

Romero replied that while it was true that Mexicans had once believed the United States was chiefly concerned with enlarging its own territorial areas, a new era had dawned. He said:

> Our common interest, political as well as commercial, will give us a common continental policy which no European nation would dare disregard.

That their joint efforts were crowned with success is a historical fact. Romero's heroic work to preserve Mexican independence entitles him to be forever remembered among his country's patriots. As Secretary Seward observed, there had been developed the "creation of mutual moral alliance, to the end that all external aggression may be prevented throughout the whole continent."

Mr. President, Mexico, like its sister Latin American States, was absorbed for nearly the entire course of the 19th century in establishing a working government under suitable constitutional restraints. It is fair to say that this noble objective was not fully achieved until the constitution of 1917 came into being. The end of the long rule of Porfirio Diaz marked the beginning of a new and more promising era in the political and social history of Mexico, ushered in by the revolution of 1910–11, a revolution which in many respects is still in progress as Mexico moves forward.

Long exploited by the Spanish, held in colonial bondage by the military power of its Spanish conqueror, exploited for centuries for the benefit of the mother country, with little opportunity to achieve any degree of social justice, individual dignity, or a higher standard of living, once the shackles of colonialism were thrown off, Mexico's achievements to date in promoting a better life for all her people have been spectacular. It is well for us to remember that we were able to establish a constitutional government by 1787, and could, therefore, concentrate our energies on other concerns. The acorn from which our system sprang was ripened on the British oak, and we did not suffer the crippling effects of a sharply stratified society. But in spite of the many obstacles, democracy in Mexico has flourished.

Today, we share with Mexico a great deal more than our 1,935 miles of a common border. We have entered upon a new era of mutual cooperation and respect. The recent visit of President Eisenhower to Mexico and the official visit of Mexico's distinguished President, Lopez-Mateos, to the United States are indicative of this era. The forms of our cooperation may take many guises. It may involve a joint commission to wipe out a destructive hoof-and-mouth disease or any other hindrance which distresses both peoples. It may take the form of that unique and enduring monument to Mexican-United States cooperation, the mighty Falcon Dam, constructed and built by the two governments on the Rio Grande, 75 miles downstream from Laredo. Or it may take the form of a cultural exchange program. But whatever the nature of cooperation between our two countries, we labor toward a common goal: to advance the cause of peace with honor among all peoples of the world.

Mr. President, let this monument to Mexico's 150 years of independence stand as a mute reminder of how long and hard the road to freedom has been. We hope that it will serve to strengthen the ties that bind us in a common purpose.

Mr. President, the inscription on the Hoover Library on War, Revolution and Peace, located on the Stanford University campus, in my native State says: "Let the winds of freedom blow." Mr. President, may the monument we erect in Mexico City forever remind us that our common goal, reached by different means, is to do just that: let the winds of freedom blow, for ourselves and for all men.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of our bill be set forth in full at this point in the RECORD, and that the bill be held at the desk until Monday, before being printed, in the event that any other of my colleagues desire to join in sponsoring the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will be printed in the RECORD, and will lie on the desk, as requested by the Senator from California.

The bill (S. 2827) to provide for the presentation by the United States to the people of Mexico of a monument commemorating the 150th anniversary of the independence of Mexico, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. KUCHEL (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of State is authorized and requested to procure a monument appropriately commemorating the attainment of independence by Mexico, and present the same, on behalf of the people of the United States, to the people of Mexico in commemoration of the occasion of the 150th anniversary of the independence of Mexico. Such monument shall be prepared only after the design, plans, and specifications therefor have been submitted to and approved by the Commission of Fine Arts.

SEC. 2. There are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act, including payment of the cost of such statue, the design and construction of a suitable pedestal therefor, transportation, including insurance, and traveling expenses of persons delegated by the Secretary of State to present such statue, on behalf of the people of the United States, to the people of Mexico.

ADDITIONAL MEMBER OF ADVISORY BOARD OF ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

Mr. HARTKE. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill providing for the appointment of one additional member to the Advisory Board of the St. Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation. Indiana is the only State bordering on the Great Lakes or the St. Lawrence Seaway which has never been represented on the Advisory Board or in one of the positions of authority authorized by the St. Lawrence Seaway Act. The other seven States have been represented. The five-member Advisory Board has been, and is, composed of citizens representing the States of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Wisconsin, and Michigan. The States of Illinois and Minnesota had representation in that individuals from these States were appointed Administrator and Deputy Administrator of the St. Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation. Indiana, alone, remains as the only State bordering on the Great Lakes and the Seaway which has never had representation.

I have introduced this proposed legislation today with the hope that the additional member authorized will be selected from Indiana.

Much remains to be done in the development of the Seaway. When consideration is given to further improvements I want the State of Indiana to be represented. We have a real stake in this and I earnestly hope that this legislation will receive early consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 2829) to amend section 2 of the act of May 13, 1954, so as to provide for the appointment of one additional member to the Advisory Board of the St. Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation, introduced by Mr. HARTKE, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

PARTICIPATION IN INTERNATIONAL BUREAU FOR PROTECTION OF INDUSTRIAL PROPERTY

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, by request I introduce, for appropriate reference, a joint resolution to authorize appropriations incident to U.S. participation in the International Bureau for the Protection of Industrial Property, and for other purposes.

The proposed legislation has been requested by the Secretary of State in a letter to the Vice President of December 31, 1959, and I am introducing it in order that there may be a specific joint resolution to which Members of the Senate and the public may direct their attention and comments.

I reserve my right to support or oppose this joint resolution, as well as any suggested amendments to it, when the matter is considered by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be printed in the RECORD at this point, together with the letter from the Secretary of State to the Vice President with regard to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the joint resolution and letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 149) to authorize appropriations incident to U.S. participation in the International Bureau for the Protection of Industrial Property, introduced by Mr. FULBRIGHT (by request), was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the Department of State—

(a) The sum of $10,514 for payment by the United States of certain contributions for the support of the International Bureau for the Protection of Industrial Property for the period beginning July 1, 1950, and extending through the fiscal year expiring June 30, 1959; and

(b) Such sums, not to exceed $7,250 annually, as may be required thereafter for the payment by the United States of its proportionate share of the expenses of said International Bureau.

The letter presented by Mr. FULBRIGHT is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 31, 1959.

The Honorable RICHARD M. NIXON,
President of the Senate.

DEAR MR. VICE PRESIDENT: I submit herewith a proposed draft joint resolution to authorize appropriations incident to U.S. participation in the International Bureau for the Protection of Industrial Property. The legislation would increase the annual U.S. contribution from approximately $1,767 to approximately $7,250 and authorize the payment of certain additional contributions for the years 1950–59, a period when other members were supporting its activities on the basis of a higher budget than called for in the Industrial Property Convention.

U.S. participation is by virtue of the fact that it is a party to the Convention of Union of Paris of March 20, 1883, for the protection of industrial property, as revised at Washington on June 2, 1911 (38 Stat. 1645; TS 579), at The Hague on November 6, 1925 (47 Stat. 1789; TS 834), and at London on June 2, 1934 (53 Stat. 1748; TS 941). In accordance with article 1 of the convention, the countries to which the convention applies constituted themselves into a Union for the Protection of Industrial Property.

The convention provides basically that each country shall accord to nationals of other member countries the same protection with respect to industrial property rights that it accords its own nationals. Nationals of member countries are also accorded, throughout the Union, certain special rights and advantages, such as the right of priority and protection against arbitrary forfeiture of patents, if not immediately worked. The provisions governing priority are particularly important. Under these provisions, when an American inventor has filed for a patent in the United States or a member country on a given date, he has a 1-year period from the date of his first filing to file a corresponding patent application and acquire appropriate protection in other member countries. A similar 6-month right of priority applies to trademarks.

The convention also establishes an international office known as the International Bureau for the Protection of Industrial Property which performs the following administrative functions: (1) Serves as a clearinghouse for information on and interpretation of patent and trademark laws; (2) serves as a medium to promote the ratification by members of revisions of the convention and the adherence of new members; (3) collects and publishes information relating to matters of general usefulness to the Union, and prepares a periodical paper concerning matters of interest to the Union; (4) holds itself at the service of members of the Union in order to supply them with any special information they may need on questions relating to the international system of industrial property; (5) handles the preparatory and administrative work of the conferences of revision.

The Convention for the Protection of Industrial Property provides that the budget of the International Bureau shall not exceed 140,000 Swiss francs. This is made up of a limitation of 120,000 Swiss francs upon the ordinary expenses of the Bureau and a limitation of 20,000 Swiss francs upon certain extraordinary expenses not covered under the ordinary budget. In addition, article 13 of the convention (53 Stat. 1781) provides that the ordinary expenses might be increased, in cases of necessity, by a unanimous decision of one of the conferences provided for by article 14.

For many years the United States has been paying its share of the expenses of the Bureau calculated on the basis of the stated 140,000 Swiss franc limitation. This has been so despite the fact that this amount had proven inadequate as early as 1950, and other members of the Union have been supporting the organization on the basis of a higher budget than called for in the convention.

At the recent Diplomatic Conference at Lisbon for revision of the convention, the United States delegation was prepared to support a unanimous decision of the Conference in accord with article 13, substantially to increase the Bureau's maximum expenditures in the light of a clear demonstration of the great inadequacy of the present level. However, the Conference was unable to reach unanimity on this point because of the interjection of a totally extraneous issue. The Soviet bloc members of the Union maintained the position that unanimity on this issue was impossible because of the absence of East Germany, not invited to the Conference although it had tried earlier to adhere to the convention. The Conference, under the leadership of the United States and the Federal Republic of Germany, was unwilling to accept any wording of the resolution on funds which would carry with it the implication that this was a valid argument. Prolonged negotiations were fruitless and no wording could be devised which would have the force of a unanimous decision of the Conference as required by articles 13 and 14 of the convention. As a compromise, the following resolution was adopted: "The Conference * * * invites the countries of the Union to raise their contribution, beginning on the 1st of January 1959, in order to bring the funds of the International Bureau to the amount of 600,000 Swiss francs annually."

The Department is of the view that it is in the best interests of the United States to accept the invitation to raise its annual contribution to the International Bureau for the Protection of Industrial Property in order that the extremely valuable and important services performed can be continued. The benefits to the United States from its membership far exceed the funds contributed annually toward the support of the Bureau. It is also considered in the best interests of the United States to make certain contributions constituting the difference between the amounts already paid by the United States, calculated on the basis of the 140,000 Swiss franc limitation, and the amounts it would have paid had it been able to contribute toward the actual costs of the operations of the Bureau for the years 1950–59. The United States has been receiving the additional benefits from the activities of the Bureau but has not been paying its fair share of the cost for the years involved. Practically all of the members of the Union have been paying on the basis of a higher budget than the United States. It does not improve the U.S. Government's posture with the Bureau or its relations with other members of the Union to be the recipient of the benefits of the increased activity and services of the Bureau paid for by increased contributions from other member states.

It is hoped that the Congress will be able to take action on this request during the current session.

A similar communication is being sent to the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

The Department has been advised by the Bureau of the Budget that there is no objection to the submission of this proposal to the Congress for its consideration.

Most sincerely,

CHRISTIAN A. HERTER.

INCREASED TRAVEL ALLOWANCE FOR GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES—AMENDMENT

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, I submit an amendment, intended to be proposed by me, to the bill (H.R. 5196) to increase the maximum rates of per diem allowance for employees of the Government traveling on official business, and for other purposes, which is now pending before the Committee on Government Operations.

As this bill came from the House of Representatives, it increases the maximum rates of per diem allowance for employees of the Government traveling on official business from $12 to $15 and the mileage rate from 10 to 12 cents per mile. I am informed that the bill does not increase the mileage rates for U.S. marshals and their deputies, and it is the purpose of this amendment to make the U.S. marshals and their deputies eligible for the increased mileage rate.

I am informed that the Department of Justice has suggested such an amendment to the Committee on Government Operations, and I hope that it will be adopted when the committee considers the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be received, printed, and referred to the Committee on Government Operations.

FEDERAL ELECTIONS ACT OF 1959—AMENDMENTS

Mr. BENNETT submitted amendments, intended to be proposed by him, to the bill (S. 2436) to revise the Federal election laws, to prevent corrupt practices in Federal elections, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. GORE submitted amendments, intended to be proposed by him to Senate bill 2436, supra, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

PREVENTION OF COMMUNIST CONTROL OF COUNTRIES IN THE CARIBBEAN—ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR OF CONCURRENT RESOLUTION

Under authority of the order of the Senate of January 7, 1960, the name of Senator SPARKMAN was added as an additional cosponsor of the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 79) looking to the prevention of Communist control of countries in the Caribbean, submitted by Mr. BUSH on January 7, 1960.

AGREEMENT WITH AUSTRIA REGARDING RETURN OF AUSTRIAN PROPERTY, RIGHTS, AND INTERESTS—REMOVAL OF INJUNCTION OF SECRECY

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, as in executive session, I ask unanimous consent that the injunction of secrecy be removed from executive A, 86th Congress, 2d session, an agreement between the United States of America and the Republic of Austria regarding the return of Austrian property, rights, and interests, signed at Washington on January 30, 1959, and that the agreement, together with the President's message, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and that the President's message be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Montana? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The message from the President is as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

With a view to receiving the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification, I transmit herewith an agreement between the United States of America and the Republic of Austria regarding the return of Austrian property, rights, and interests, signed at Washington on January 30, 1959.

I transmit also for the information of the Senate the report made to me by the Acing Secretary of State regarding the agreement.

The agreement provides for the return of certain Austrian property in the United States which was taken under control by the Office of Alien Property during World War II under the provisions of the Trading with the Enemy Act. The property or proceeds thereof will be turned over to the Austrian Government for delivery to the individual claimants.

By article 27 of the Austrian State Treaty, signed on May 15, 1955, the United States declared its intention to return such property. This agreement will enable the United States to fulfill its obligation in that regard.

I recommend that the Senate take favorable action with respect to the agreement.

DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 14, 1960.

ANNOUNCEMENT OF FURTHER PUBLIC HEARINGS ON WIRETAPPING, EAVESDROPPING, THE RIGHT OF PRIVACY, AND THE BILL OF RIGHTS

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I wish to announce, as chairman of the Senate Constitutional Rights Subcommittee, that public hearings will be resumed in connection with our continuing study of wiretapping, eavesdropping, the right of privacy, and the Bill of Rights, on Tuesday morning, February 16, 1960, at 10:30 a.m. in the caucus room—room 318—of the Old Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

Witnesses to be heard are representatives of American telephone companies.

In the course of the subcommittee's hearings in December 1959 questions arose about what telephone companies do, if anything, to protect subscribers' telephone lines from wiretapping. American Telephone & Telegraph Co. officials subsequently indicated a desire to amplify views presented to the subcommittee at our first hearing on this subject in the previous Congress. Accordingly, we are happy to give them this further opportunity to testify.

Witnesses scheduled are Mr. Wellington Powell, vice president, operations, of the New York Telephone Co.; accompanied by Mr. John Quisenberry, general solicitor of the American Telephone & Telegraph Co.

NOTICE OF EXECUTIVE HEARINGS BY COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS ON MILITARY AND ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENTS IN THE SOVIET BLOC DURING THE PAST YEAR

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, I wish to announce that Mr. Allen Dulles will appear before the Committee on Foreign Relations in executive session at 2 p.m., on Monday, January 18, to discuss military and economic developments in the Soviet bloc during the past year.

I also wish to say that efforts have been made on the part of the committee to arrange for a similar meeting with Secretary Gates and the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, General Twining, to discuss with the Committee on Foreign Relations the state of readiness of our domestic Military Establishment insofar as that has a significance to the conduct of foreign policy. The Department of Defense has informed the committee, however, that the schedules of Secretary Gates and General Twining are so full that they will not be able to meet with the committee for this purpose until possibly late February.

Secretary Herter is scheduled to testify before the committee in executive session at 2 p.m., on Thursday, January 21, to review foreign policy developments during the period of the congressional recess.

NOTICE OF PUBLIC HEARINGS ON SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 17 BY COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I announce that on Tuesday, January 19, at 10 a.m., in room 4221 of the New Senate Office Building, the Committee on Foreign Relations will hold a public hearing on Senate Concurrent Resolution 17, favoring a convention of delegates from Atlantic democracies looking to a greater cooperation and unity of purpose.

As this hearing is next Tuesday, persons wishing to present their views should get into immediate touch with the clerk of the committee.

NOTICE OF HEARING ON NOMINATIONS OF G. FREDERICK REINHARDT TO BE AMBASSADOR TO THE UNITED ARAB REPUBLIC, AND TO SERVE CONCURRENTLY AS ENVOY AND MINISTER TO THE KINGDOM OF YEMEN, AND TYLER THOMPSON TO BE AMBASSADOR TO ICELAND, BY COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, on behalf of the Committee on Foreign Relations, I desire to announce that the Senate today received the nominations of G. Frederick Reinhardt, of California, to be Ambassador to the United Arab Republic, and to serve concurrently and without additional compensation as Envoy and Minister to the Kingdom of Yemen, and Tyler Thompson, of Maine, to be Ambassador to Iceland.

In accordance with the committee rule, the pending nominations may not be considered prior to the expiration of 6 days.

NOTICE OF HEARING ON NOMINATION OF WALTER H. HODGE TO BE U.S. DISTRICT JUDGE, DISTRICT OF ALASKA

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, on behalf of the Committee on the Judiciary, I desire to announce that a public hearing has been scheduled on the nomination of Walter H. Hodge, of Alaska, to be U.S. district judge, district of Alaska, for 10:30 a.m., on Friday, January 22, 1960, in room 2228, New Senate Office Building.

At the indicated time and place all persons interested in the nomination may make such representations as are pertinent. The subcommittee consists of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HRUSKA], and myself, as chairman.

NOTICE OF HEARING ON NORTH AMERICAN REGIONAL BROADCASTING AGREEMENT AND BROADCASTING AGREEMENT WITH MEXICO

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, notice is hereby given that the Subcommittee on the North American Regional Broadcasting Agreement and the Broadcasting Agreement With Mexico will hold a public hearing on January 25 at 10 a.m. in room 4221, New Senate Office Building, to receive the comments of interested agencies and representatives of the industry on the subcommittee's interim report of August 1959.

Persons desiring to comment on the report are asked to notify the chief clerk of the Committee on Foreign Relations as soon as possible. Testimony should be confined to the alternative courses of action set forth on page 6 of the interim report.

After these hearings, it is the intention of the subcommittee to reach a final decision on the disposal of the two broadcasting agreements.

ADDRESSES, EDITORIALS, ARTICLES, ETC., PRINTED IN THE RECORD

On request, and by unanimous consent, addresses, editorials, articles, etc., were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. KEATING:

Letter from him to Senator BENNETT of Utah, dated January 12, 1960, relating to the motion picture "On the Beach."

By Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota:

Questionnaire on political subjects mailed by him to 27,000 North Dakota people.

PRESIDENT HITS SPREAD OF BIGOTRY AND PREJUDICE

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, we recognize that the establishment of a lasting peace is the No. 1 challenge before the world.

Historically, mankind has been faced with a cycle of threats to the dignity and freedom of its people—indeed, to life itself. Yesterday, they would be threatened by Hitlerism. Today, the menace is communism.

To counter these threats, a vast volume of resources, manpower, and brainpower has been dedicated.

If we are to establish a lasting peace, however, the world must go further toward improving human and national relationships than resolving economic differences and stopping military offensives. We face fundamental tasks of promoting better real understanding among peoples, including the eradication of prejudice, bigotry, race hatred, interclass violence, and other such forces which threaten to disrupt peaceful relations among men within countries and between nations.

Regrettably, even as we mobilize our forces to fight communism, the world now finds that there are reappearing on the horizon old foes to freedom.

Specifically, I speak of the Nazi-sponsored anti-Semitic waves that have hit Western Germany.

I sincerely hope that the actions of an irresponsible minority in Western Germany will not reflect unfavorably upon the tremendous effort which the West German people are making toward democratic processes and the protection of freedom for themselves.

Particularly, I was gratified to see my longtime friend, Chancellor Adenauer, as a great patriot, serving not only the German people but world peace, speak out forthrightly against the anti-Semitism.

However, the reappearance of anti-Semitic swastikas signals to the world that there still exists, even within nations outside the Communist orbit, the seeds of evil that can destroy freedom, and if provided the opportunity probably would ultimately do so.

We recognize, of course, the great, and perhaps eternal challenge to reform humanity into a real brotherhood. Only the future can tell how far we are from the time when men can really and truly live with each other in peace.

Meanwhile, our task as freedom-lovers is to be alert against the tremendous damage which not only the flare-up of anti-Semitism in West Germany, but also interracial clashes in nations around the globe, can have on the cause of freedom and on the ultimate hope of mankind for a lasting peace.

As could be expected, the Communists are alert to take advantage, for exploitation purposes, particularly in counterpropaganda, of internal conflicts in the Western World.

In the January 13 edition of the Washington Evening Star there was published an article which outlines the views of President Eisenhower and other national leaders against the waves of bigotry and prejudice.

I request unanimous consent to have the article printed in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PRESIDENT HITS SPREAD OF BIGOTRY, PREJUDICE

NEW YORK, January 13.—President Eisenhower, noting recent anti-Semitic vandalism, says "the virus of bigotry" must not be allowed "to spread one inch."

In a message read last night at an emergency meeting of the American Jewish Congress, Mr. Eisenhower said that when bigotry "becomes rampant it can cause the destruction of freedom and decency everywhere."

"In this age, when so much is expected and required of America, we can ill afford to waste a single day combating bigotry or prejudice at home," the President declared.

The message was addressed to the National Conference of Christians and Jews in reply to a telegram last Thursday from representatives of the Protestant, Catholic, and Jewish faiths. They voiced concern to the President over the threat of religious bigotry in politics and the anti-Semitic outbreaks.

In a note read at the meeting, a White House aide, Gerald D. Morgan, said: "Like you, the President has been concerned about the recent outbreak of religious intolerance and views it with deep loathing."

ROCKEFELLER STATEMENT

Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller wired the American Jewish Congress:

"The recent outbreak of vandalism of synagogues and churches is shocking. Every thinking person is indignant at these shameful acts and those responsible for these depredations in various parts of the world."

At the Jewish Congress emergency meeting Protestant and Catholic leaders deplored the recent vandalism. A message from Richard Cardinal Cushing, of Boston, said: "I know I speak for millions of Catholics when I offer my prayerful sympathy to our Jewish friends and neighbors."

Bishop James A. Pike, of the Episcopal Diocese of California, said in a message that every effort must be made to stamp out the anti-Semitic acts. He said they constitute a "reflection on the inadequacy of the teaching of Christians and others in regard to brotherhood and the common religious and ethical foundations of Judaism and Christianity."

The Right Reverend Horace W. B. Donegan, bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Diocese of New York, a principal speaker at the meeting, noted that the huge Episcopal Cathedral of St. John the Divine here recently had been smeared with the Star of David. With the mark was the inscription "An eye for an eye."

"The prankster, neurotic, or misguided individual" responsible for the marking would "scarcely have bothered," said Bishop Donegan, "had he known that the Star of David appears more than 100 times in the cathedral."

COMBINED MEETING

An official of the American Jewish Congress said the meeting was the first time that leaders of the major religious faiths in the Western Hemisphere discussed from the same platform the wave of synagogue defacements.

The president of the American Jewish Congress, Dr. Joachim Prinz, warned against underestimating the significance of the swastika daubings.

They should not be dismissed, he said, as a mere "fad like the hula-hoop or rock-'n'-roll. The cry of 'death to the Jews' embodied in the swastika is a dangerous lyric for a rock-'n'-roll number."

INTEREST RATES AND INFLATION

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, the President of the United States has again sent to Congress a recommendation that the interest-rate ceiling on long-term Treasury marketable bonds be removed.

Mr. President, this has become one of the most important domestic issues facing the Senate at the present time, if not the most important; and I hope that, in light of events which have transpired since Members of Congress went home in September, those who are opposed to this recommendation may take a different view and realize that the credit of the Government of the United States, upon which our national security and the security of the whole free world depends, is involved in this particular issue.

I point out again, as I have before, that compliance with this recommendation is a move for lower, not higher, interest rates. Indeed, if we do not accede to the President's recommendation, the inflationary forces which will continue to be generated can very seriously endanger our national defense effort by greatly increasing the cost thereof.

Mr. President, in the Wall Street Journal of today there appeared a short editorial entitled "The Inflation Seekers," which comes to grips with this issue in a very succinct and acute way. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE INFLATION SEEKERS

Many Democrats in Congress are reportedly asking themselves this question: How can they vote now to end the arbitrary interest-rate ceiling on new offerings of longer term Government bonds and then in the fall campaign turn around and attack the administration's high-interest-rate policy?

It is an interesting political question, but essentially it is an unreal one.

In the first place, a vote to end the ceiling is not a vote for higher interest rates. In his brief urgent message to Congress this week, President Eisenhower said early removal of the ceiling is "imperative" for the sake of sound debt management.

Why? Because this archaic, artificial obstruction forces the Treasury into inflationary short-term financing. "As a result," the President said, "short-term Treasury borrowing costs have risen to the highest levels in several decades.

Thus a vote to remove this large impediment might well be, in effect, a vote for some lower interest rates. Certainly its continuation is not bringing the lower rates so many Democrats profess to cherish; quite the contrary.

In any case, high interest rates are not the administration's policy. The cost of borrowing money has risen because the demand has risen; the Treasury, for its part, would be glad to get its money cheaper. The only thing this administration and the Federal Reserve Board have not been prepared to do is deliberately start a vast new inflation in the hope of forcing interest rates down in defiance of market forces.

These election-minded Democrats doubtless know all this (if they don't, it's a pretty sad reflection on them). So the suspicion must grow that they are not primarily concerned about the alleged political dangers of acceding to the President's eminently sane request in this particular case.

Instead, it looks as though they are just bound and determined to do nothing whatever that might stand in the way of the inflation they seek.

BIRTHDAY OF ALBERT SCHWEITZER

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, today the world celebrates the 85th birthday of Albert Schweitzer, missionary-doctor, scholar, philosopher, musician, and humanist.

Dr. Schweitzer has won universal acclaim because of his work, and his career has been devoted to the service of his fellow men.

From the heart of Africa, where in 1913, he founded a mission hospital which today has become a great health-giving center in which more than 500 patients are treated each month, his spirit has radiated to all parts of the world.

He has written:

It seems to me a matter of course that we should all take our share of the burden of pain which lies upon the world.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, editorials on Dr. Schweitzer's birthday, which were printed today in the New York Herald Tribune and the Washington Post.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ALBERT SCHWEITZER: A LEGEND IN HIS TIME

(By Herbert Kupferberg)

For many years the world at large was content to leave Albert Schweitzer to the admiration of African natives and European scholars. But today his 85th birthday is a matter of universal celebration, with heads of state among those raining messages of congratulation upon his hospital headquarters in the African jungle.

Even the man in the street, that mighty if mythical judge of human stature, has an idea that the aged missionary-doctor is among the great men of earth. In a Gallup poll last month the American public rated him No. 3 among the most admired men in the world today, right behind such unassailable heroes as Dwight D. Eisenhower and Winston Churchill.

It was not always thus, for Schweitzer for many years was known mostly in narrow fields. He was always highly regarded in the limited worlds of philosophy, theology, and music, all of which he had long ago enriched with his writings. He was respected by those who knew of his decision, at the age of 38, to give up a brilliant European career to become a missionary-physician in Lambaréné, a few miles above the Equator on the Ogowe River in French Equatorial Africa.

Yet it is only in recent years, when the airplane has turned Lambaréné almost into a place of pilgrimage, that Schweitzer's name and fame have become universal. Photographers have journeyed to Africa to make movies of him at work; sound engineers have set up equipment in his native town in Alsace to record him playing the organ in the village church.

A dozen biographies of him have appeared in the last dozen years; books he himself wrote decades ago, such as "The Quest of the Historical Jesus" and his critical biography of Johann Sebastian Bach, have undergone a revival of interest. His pronouncements upon the dangers of nuclear radiation are received with respect, even though there are those who would dismiss as impractical the man who with his own hands fashioned a hospital from a jungle and brought help, hope and relief from pain where none had been before.

Much of Schweitzer's current fame, particularly in the United States, began with a visit—his only one—he made to this country in 1949. Typically, his journey illustrated still another facet of his astonishing career, for he was invited to lecture at Aspen, Colo., upon the bicentenary of Goethe's birth.

As a news event, a doctor arriving from Africa to give a talk on a dead German poet might seem to have its limitations. But Schweitzer, to his own astonishment no less than others', was swamped by a large turnout of shipboard reporters, including photographers who addressed him as "Doc" as they hustled about the ship's deck.

It was a mass interview never forgotten by those who participated in it. One reporter even deliberated whether to break an unwritten rule by bringing along one of Schweitzer's books to be autographed. Fearing a ribbing from his journalistic colleagues, he decided against it. He was chagrined to find other newspapermen eagerly thrusting note pads and sheets of copy paper at the patient, walrus-moustached, elderly man in the old-fashioned frock coat. Schweitzer not only signed his name on each scrap of paper, he courteously wrote an extended inscription upon it—while the reporter who had left his book home stood by in silent frustration.

It was at this press conference that Schweitzer discovered he was expected to express views upon most of the problems confronting humanity, ranging from communism and the atom bomb to his impressions of the United States. Asked how faith could best be opposed to communism, he said: "These questions do not exist in the forests and jungles of Africa. The best thing with which to oppose communism is non-communism—to give all possible liberties, material and spiritual, to all individuals."

On the atom bomb, he declined to make any comment at all, although in later years he was to have a good deal to say about it. When he was asked what he thought of America, he chuckled and replied: "I swore when I left Europe I wouldn't answer that. Those who know America should answer it."

Incidentally, someone told him a few years later about the reporter who hadn't brought the book down to be autographed. He forthwith wrote him a litle note saying: "How often do I think of you, unconsciously, when I remember the friendly welcome of the gentlemen of the press in New York."

This is to tell him that the warm memories are reciprocated, and to wish him happy birthday.

[From the Washington (D.C.) Post, Jan. 14, 1960]

SAGE OF LAMBARENE

It is a pleasure to extend best wishes to Dr. Albert Schweitzer on his 85th birthday anniversary. Incontestably, Dr. Schweitzer is a great and good man, and the world will enjoy one of its rare moments of unanimity today in hoping that this voice out of Africa will be heard for a long time to come. It would, however, be perfectly in character for Dr. Schweitzer to ignore the hubbub and continue—as he has for half a century—his simple round of tasks at Lambarene, his mission in the new Gabon Republic of what used to be French Equatorial Africa. One of the marks of his character, and perhaps a secret of his greatness, has been Dr. Schweitzer's indifference to the nudge of convention.

This trait showed itself early in Dr. Schweitzer's life. In 1905, at the age of 30, he stunned his friends by renouncing his three careers—all successful—as a theologian, organist, and biographer of Bach. He began training as a doctor, and soon left his native Alsace the better to serve mankind in the dense jungles of Africa. There, as director of a medical mission, he flourished, and the world has been the richer for what once seemed a foolish gesture of renunciation. His credo of reverence for life has acquired a force far beyond that of any battalion.

But, as John Gunther observes, "Schweitzer would be intolerable if, together with his overwhelming intellectual and moral virtues, he did not have his defects." The defects are there; Gunther notes correctly that in Dr. Schweitzer's attitude to the African, the old doctor sometimes displays the irritation and despair of a European colonial. It does not diminish his stature to concede the justness of the reproach. But it does help to point up that the colonialists' contribution to Africa is not wholly a record of shame and exploitation. Cruel masters and selfish investors did come to feed on Africa—but with them came men like Dr. Schweitzer. This is something of which the world, not only the white man, can rightly be proud.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I wish to invite the attention of the distinguished majority leader and the distinguished minority leader, in order to remind them of the fact that upon the occasion of the birthday of Robert Frost, the great American poet, the Senate adopted a resolution, which was a very kind and nice thing to do. So I should like to talk with them, if they will be kind enough to think about the possibility of doing something of that sort in regard to the 85th birthday of Albert Schweitzer. I think the suggestion is worth considering from the point of view of whether it would be proper, appropriate, and desirable for the Senate to take action to commemorate the remarkable career of this great man.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, let me say to my friend, the Senator from New York, that as he knows—and he is always a delightful conversationalist—I always welcome counsel from him.

I have not explored the matter to which he has referred, and I do not know what can be done about it. However, there is no Member of the Senate with whom I enjoy working more than I do with the Senator from New York. So I shall enjoy conferring with him and with the minority leader and other interested Senators; and I shall be glad to make whatever contribution we can under the circumstances.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I am very grateful to my colleague.

The only reason for my mentioning it publicly is that I know he, like all of us, admires Dr. Schweitzer, and would wish to join in all I have said about him.

WITH NO BILL OF RIGHTS TO PROTECT THEM, INDIVIDUALS FARE BADLY IN DEMOCRACIES

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, in government, as in any of life's activities, something which is good in a proper quantity almost inevitably becomes something bad if it is employed to excess. This truth applies in government even to democracy and freedom, for it is possible that democratic methods can be used to destroy freedom.

Although this statement may surprise some legislators today, it would not in the least have surprised the Founding Fathers of this Nation, who established not a democracy, but a Republic.

The American form of democracy was not intended to equalize men economically and socially by statute, and, in my conviction, should not be so used today.

The American form of democracy was intended and should be used to provide equal opportunity for individual endeavor—a fair chance to get ahead.

Mr. President, I do not intend to make a speech. Instead I should like to draw to the attention of all my colleagues an editorial on this timely subject. It is entitled: "With No Bill of Rights To Protect Them, Individuals Fare Badly in Democracies," and it appears in the January 9, 1960, issue of the Saturday Evening Post.

I ask unanimous consent that this editorial be printed in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WITH NO BILL OF RIGHTS TO PROTECT THEM, INDIVIDUALS FARE BADLY IN DEMOCRACIES

(By Oscar Ibele)

Liberty is the absence of coercion of a human being by any other human being or beings. Democracy by definition presumes a system of government in which the power to decide upon major public policies is vested in the people. Democracy and liberty have come to be regarded as indispensable to each other, like "love and marriage." But just as lovers occasionaly bludgeon each other, so democracy can become the enemy of freedom. Without constitutional restraints, the will of the majority would show small concern for the basic rights of minorities and individuals.

How can democratic methods be used to destroy the substance of liberty? The answer lies in the way democracy has been extended beyond its traditional dimensions. The democratic system is continually being pressed to become an instrument for the forcible redistribution of wealth and the expansion of government.

As conceived by the founders of the American form of democracy, government was to provide political and legal equality of citizenship. All qualified citizens should be able to vote and hold office and enjoy equal protection before the law. Modern demagogs pervert this to mean economic and social equality, equality by statute. To our Founding Fathers equality meant an equal opportunity to try, not a right to the fruits of the success of others. Our second President, John Adams, contended that, while moral equality might exist at birth, different talents and efforts would inevitably create strata in wealth and social prestige. "Make all men Newtons," he said, "or if you will, Jeffersons, or Taylors, or Randolphs, and they would all perish in a heap."

The Founding Fathers were acutely conscious of the perils of demogogy inherent in popular government. In the Constitution, therefore, they established not a democracy but a republic, with built-in safeguards against unrestrained mass rule, such as separation of powers, checks and balances, a federation of States, in order to protect the talented "forgotten man" from the aggressive propensities of his common fellow citizens. Since 1789 these qualifications and protective restrictions have been progressively eroded by judicial interpretation or swept away by constitutional amendment. Thus the way is left open for all sorts of welfare schemes, many of doubtful constitutional or financial legitimacy.

Senator MCCLELLAN, head of the Senate Committee on Government Operations, reported in 1957 that there was a tremendous ground swell of public sentiment for economy in Government. At the same time he admitted that testimony from the public is rarely, if ever, received in the committees of Congress, which make the big decisions on Government fiscal policy. Economy-minded voters are effectively frustrated at the critical stages of legislative procedure by well-heeled pressure groups and governmental bureaucrats, who tend to overawe congressional committee members with their pleas for ever-larger expenditures for all sorts of schemes, from subsidizing unwed mothers to urban renewal.

What the Government subsidizes it can also control. As its power increases, our freedom diminishes. Many vigilant persons recognize this peril to their liberties, but in the face of the tremendous voting power of the pressure groups and other recipients of free Federal money, the odds are increasingly against them.

De Tocqueville was right. It is possible for the people to vote themselves into bondage. We shall be fortunate if this doesn't happen to us.

FIRES OF FREEDOM—EDITORIAL BY FRANCIS H. BUFFUM

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, in these days, when there are those who would have Americans think they are sinking into a second-class nation, and that the only way to overcome our so-called weaknesses is to pile bureaucracy on top of bureaucracy with a centralized government in control of all individuals, it is like a breath of fresh air to find a voice which acknowledges our strength.

Mr. Francis H. Buffum, in his column "Fires of Freedom," appearing in the Manchester (N.H.) Union Leader of January 6, 1960, states:

Just as the value of the forest depends upon the fiber and growth of the trees that compose it, so the value of a society depends upon the character of the individuals who constitute it.

He asks:

How then does a society develop in the individual?—by submerging him in a national socialistic mass administered by a Federal bureaucracy?

He brings out the point that liberty of the individual was what produced the American character and made America invincible, until the early part of this century when the individual began leaning on his Government for support and relinquishing his rights to the bureaucrat. This, he says, the Communists are well aware of, and they are doing everything in their power to promote it.

Mr. President, because so much truth is contained in this article, I commend it to my colleagues, and ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FIRES OF FREEDOM

(By Francis H. Buffum)

"The most urgent present need of America at this critical juncture is not more mechanization but more character."—James H. Breastead.

The above statement was made before the Red tide of communism threatened to inundate the world and destroy our present civilization. It was doubtless true when written. Is it true today?

Would Mr. Breastead now consider character more important than machines at this critical juncture? We are all so deeply involved in this question—in the comparative importance of mechanization and character—that it will pay us well to take a good look at it.

No one who is in the know will question America's urgent need of the best machines and scientific instruments that the genius of our scientists can invent and our artisans can produce for self-defense. The Russians are keenly aware of all this, and have concentrated on it in their bid for world domination. But they have discarded something which, if understood and used to its full potential by us before the 11th hour strikes, will spell their doom; and if neglected by us, will spell ours. Their hope of defeating us lies in our having forgotten and neglected the prime factor of our strength.

I refer to something more than being good technicians and fighters. Presumably the Russians would be able to match us in both of these categories in course of time, and do it under Marxist rules if technical skill alone could determine the outcome of this now global contest. But the battle will not go "to heathen heart that puts its trust in reeking tube and iron shard."

Reason leads us to accept Mr. Breastead's estimate of the relative importance of character, and to do so without belittling our industrial achievements. Let us beware, however, of thinking that Americans have a monopoly on it. In fact, our commercial success has had a tendency to make us neglectful of some of its finer attributes which men elsewhere have acquired. But character in general, as Mr. Breastead evidently means it, has achieved a more robust and widespread growth in America than in any of the other so-called great nations. Why?

Just as the value of a forest depends upon the fiber and growth of the trees that compose it, so the value of a society depends upon the character of the individuals who constitute it.

How then does a society develop character in the individual—by submerging him in a national socialistic mass administered by a federal bureaucracy, and finally in a socialistic world dominated by the United Nations?

The answer to this question is to be found in our history, not in the textbooks of theorists. Reduced to its simplest terms American history is the record of a people who prized liberty well enough to pay for it in the long, hard school of experience and who, through centuries of struggle, had so far developed a capacity for self-government that when they found a land where they might put their dreams to the test, produced in three centuries the greatest and most prosperous nation of all time.

Liberty of the individual, hard earned and jealously guarded, was what produced the American character and made the American Nation invincible until the individual, soon after the turn of the century, began leaning on Government for support and relinquishing the open market to the dictation of bureaucrats.

The Communists are well aware of this tendency and are doing everything in their power to promote it. They know that America is the last major bastion of freedom in the world, and that America's strength lies in the character of its freedom-loving people. Until ready for the final blow they will avoid awakening them to their danger.

At this critical juncture nothing serves the Kremlin's purpose better than a cold war of subversion—cold enough to keep the fires of freedom-loving patriots from breaking into flame.

Above all, Uncle Sam-son must not be awakened by gunfire until the Communist Philistines, with the connivance of Delilah—patron saint of traitors—are upon him.

DEFINITION OF U.S.S.R.

"The complete record of Russia of the past 40 years shows conclusively that, in spite of the Soviet flag, the nature of the Soviet regime is truly bourgeois-capitalist and anti-labor. The Union of Soviet Socialist Republics is neither a union, because it is a completely centralized state; nor is it Soviet, because it has no free workers' councils; nor Socialist, because it represses labor and accentuates class differences; nor a republic because it is an unlimited autocracy. The U.S.S.R. stands more properly for the Union of Sweatshop Runners."—From "The Secret Name," by Dr. Lin Yutang, Farrar, Straus, & Cudahy, New York, 1958.

SOVIET HAND IN ANTI-SEMITISM

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, during the past 5 years anti-Semitic incidents have been reported in several non-Communist countries.

An answer as to who may be responsible is provided by David Lawrence, editor of U.S. News & World Report, in his Washington Evening Star column of January 7. He points out that the Communists are trying to wreck the prestige of West German Chancellor Adenauer. Further, he asks why no anti-Jewish acts took place in East Germany until after the press had commented about this strange fact.

Mr. Lawrence's article furnishes a factual backdrop to these incidents, and I ask unanimous consent to have it printed in the RECORD at this point.

Also, Mr. President, William Loeb, the distinguished publisher of the Manchester (N.H.) Union Leader, agrees with David Lawrence about the probable origins of these recent anti-Jewish acts. In a signed editorial on January 5, William Loeb got to the heart of this vicious matter when he said, "The nation to gain the most by these outrages is Communist Russia."

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have this editorial printed in the RECORD at this point. This country is very fortunate to have publishers such as William Loeb, who, like Daniel Webster, believe, "There is nothing so powerful as the truth"—the slogan which appears on the masthead of his newspaper.

There being no objection, the article and editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington, (D.C) Evening Star, Thursday, Jan. 7, 1959]

SOVIET HAND IN ANTI-SEMITISM—WIDESPREAD, SIMULTANEOUS OUTBREAKS CALLED RED DRIVE AGAINST ADENAUER

(By David Lawrence)

The finger of suspicion begins to point more and more toward Communist responsibility for the wave of anti-Semitism which now has broken out sporadically in countries as far apart as Canada and Australia and Sweden and South Africa.

Even in Israel—which is the last place one would expect to see any anti-Semitic demonstrations—swastika insignia were found in a synagogue and in a labor exchange building.

Much of this has been brushed off as "crackpot activity," just as those who daubed paint on West German synagogues were promptly labeled "hooligans." But when anything occurs that is as widespread as has just been reported in the press dispatches from all parts of the world, it is apparent this is no accidental occurrence but, as the West German Government itself now declares, a well-concerted plan.

Dr. Karl Ibach, chairman of Resistance Fighters Against the Nazis, is quoted in a United Press International dispatch as having told Chancellor Adenauer there is an underground anti-Semitic movement and that its two centers in Sweden and Vienna are in contact with former Nazi leaders who have fled to Egypt. Recent reports indicate some of the anti-Semitic demonstrations in the southern part of the United States might have had their origin in certain Arab countries.

It is significant, moreover, that, although there must be a considerable number of anti-Semites in East Germany, no demonstrations occurred there for several days. Then, when the fact was noted in the press, the East Germans managed to join the procession with the painting of swastikas on walls in a small town near East Berlin.

Obviously the Communists are playing a double game. During the last 10 days, they suppressed in the Soviet press the news of the anti-Semitic demonstrations but unhesitatingly filled the air waves in the West with denunciations of West Germany as being dominated by former Nazis and Fascists.

Plainly, the Communist strategy is to injure the prestige of the Adenauer government in the free world and to weaken the influence of the Chancellor in the forthcoming summit meetings on the Berlin problem. The objective is to convince people in the West that it would be a mistake to reunify Germany. For, despite their boasts about relaxing tension, the Soviets have not given up their idea of forcing the Western Powers out of Berlin altogether.

Just why should anti-Jewish "hate paintings" appear simultaneously since Christmas Day, not only in West Germany, but in Britain, Australia, Belgium, France, Greece, Sweden, Austria and Italy, as well as in remote parts of the world? It seems incredible that the former Nazis should suddenly find themselves possessed of enough money of their own and a big enough international apparatus to carry out such a scheme. The answer probably is that there are some right-wing groups which have secret ties with the Communists, though outwardly they profess hostility to each other.

The West German Government has just declared through its press chief, Felix von Eckhardt, that, while there is no positive proof as yet that the incidents were organized and controlled by a single organization, "we hope to have the proof soon." He added that there were "definite conclusions that the incidents had been organized by some central group."

Chairman FRANCIS E. WALTER, Democrat, of the House Committee on Un-American Activities, has just declared that he has information from unassailable confidential intelligence sources showing that Communists are behind the recent anti-Semitic outbreaks in West Germany. He says the trouble is Communist-inspired for the purpose of attempting to discredit the West German Adenauer government.

The fact is that a hard core of several thousands of Communists are stationed, not only in the United States, but in all countries of the free world. Millions of dollars annually pass into the hands of Communist agents from headquarters in Canada and Mexico as well as in Argentina. In the United States, itself, the same technique has been used in the last few years in the South by painting synagogues and otherwise defacing churches.

The most important objective of the Communists today is to discredit the Adenauer government in the eyes of the world. The anti-Semitic demonstrations already have brought results by way of increasing criticism of the West German Government for an alleged lack of vigilance in cracking down on former Nazis. But the truth is the West German Government finds it difficult to take effective action against the Communists who travel back and forth across the frontier from East Germany every day carrying verbal instructions to Communist agents in the press, in the universities, in the churches, and even in the local governments in West Germany. Part of the strategy is to arouse many so-called liberals to pooh-pooh the Communist menace, and this gives the Communist apparatus even more leeway than ever before in carrying on their diabolical plots.

[From the Manchester (N.H.) Union-Leader, Jan. 5, 1960]

DISGRACEFUL TACTICS

(By William Loeb)

Decent people everywhere are profoundly shocked at the sudden desecration of Jewish synagogues and the painting of anti-Jewish signs on buildings in West Germany, England, New York City and in other parts of the world.

This newspaper joins all decent people everywhere in condemning these outrageous actions.

We further urge that the culprit be immediately brought to justice. The culprit, in our estimation, is the Communist International operating from Moscow.

No coordinated outbreak of anti-Semitism in so many different parts of the world could possibly occur unless it were in response to orders from some central headquarters. There is, unfortunately, no organization in the world that can produce such spontaneous reaction in various parts of the world except the Communist International. The Communists appear to be responsible for these anti-Jewish symbols appearing in various parts of the world, and especially in Western Germany.

And why do we believe the Reds responsible for these outrages? Because elsewhere—in this country and in other lands—never in the memory of this writer has there been more good will toward different religions, including the Jewish religion. Religious prejudice is at an alltime low in the United States, and that is so elsewhere, from what we have been able to observe.

There is no reason for this outbreak. It had to be planned by someone who had something to gain from it.

The nation to gain most by these outrages is Communist Russia.

The Communists are attempting first to seize Berlin and then to take over all of Germany and then to turn its immense technology to the benefit of the Communist world conquest.

In order to seize Berlin and West Germany they must discredit Adenauer and the German people. What better way to do it than to tell the whole world, "Well, those Germans are still nothing but a bunch of Nazi anti-Semites." Men and women of good will all over the country must remember one thing and never forget it—the Communists conquer more by psychological warfare and more by dividing peoples, than they do by military arms.

The police in every nation where the fake anti-Semitic outrages have occurred should apprehend the perpetrators of the deeds and carefully and rapidly check back their Communist connections. When the data is assembled, then the heads of the Governments of the United States, Germany, England, and the rest of the world should send a note to Khrushchev, telling him that there will be no summit meeting or any other negotiations until this latest Communist skulduggery ceases. But, to our Jewish friends we say—do not be alarmed; do not be upset—these are not genuine outbreaks of anti-Semitism. These are deliberate attempts to disturb you and to arouse suspicions of brother against brother.

There has never been a better era of good feeling between Christians and Jews than the present and it will continue as it is and will grow better as the years go by.

DR. MARTIN F. PALMER

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, last evening there was portrayed on one of the national networks the life of a very dedicated Kansan, who has built one of our important institutions concerned with children handicapped in communicative capabilities.

Approximately 25 years ago Dr. Martin F. Palmer came to Kansas and, in a very small and very humble way, started to work with the problem of handicapped children, particularly those who were handicapped in speech. He began his work at Kansas Wesleyan College, at Salina, Kans. Later he moved to Wichita, Kans., where he built a very outstanding institution.

The institute, under the direction of Dr. Palmer, has done much to help children and adults in Kansas affected with severe communicative problems. During the past 10 years alone, 11,500 children from Kansas have been helped by the institute.

The work of the institute is known throughout the world, and the people of Kansas are very proud to have this organization located in their State.

Approximately 8 percent of the population of our Nation have communicative disorders needing professional attention. A great deal more research is needed to find the answer to the many complex problems of man's highest level of function. I know the Institute of Logopedics is the best place for such research to be carried on. Nowhere in the country does one find such extensive research material, as the institute is the largest residential speech and hearing clinic in the world.

The work of this outstanding institution will be greatly enhanced now that there has been set up the Johnny Belinda Fund, the proceeds of which will be used in the interest of thousands of boys and girls. Generous contributions have already been made to the fund in support of the program.

As a member of the national board of trustees of this institution, and as a personal friend of Dr. Palmer, and one who is familiar with his work, I can only say we in Kansas are proud, and our Nation is proud of the splendid service he is rendering our handicapped children.

SEVENTY-SEVENTH ANNIVERSARY OF PASSAGE OF FIRST FEDERAL CIVIL SERVICE LAW

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, Saturday, January 16, will mark the 77th anniversary of the passage of the first Federal civil service law.

The occasion provides me with a long-sought opportunity to express the appreciation of one servant of the people for the loyalty, industry, and genuine devotion to their work of the great majority of those in Federal civil service.

The occasion also permits me to call attention at this time to the contributions to the civil service law of the first Vermonter to become President of the United States, Chester Alan Arthur.

Like his predecessor, President Garfield, Chester Arthur was himself a victim of the spoils system prevalent in the political life of his day. As President, however, he became one of the prime supporters of the Pendleton proposal for reform of the Federal civil service, and signed the bill which made it law.

While the civil service law today may be far from perfect, the original Pendleton Act and its various amendments have served to give to the career men and women in the merit civil service system a degree of stature, dignity, and security unknown to Government workers when Chester Arthur, of Fairfield, Vt., became the 21st President of the United States.

Mr. President, I desire to address myself to another subject.

FEDERAL ELECTIONS ACT OF 1959

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, I have had distributed this morning copies of an amendment which I propose to offer, probably this afternoon, to S. 2436, the Federal Elections Act of 1959. I think the amendment will strengthen the bill considerably, and I hope Senators who are interested will take time to read the amendment and will be prepared to ask any questions they desire at the proper time.

PROGRAM OF ASSISTANCE TO CORRECT INEQUITIES IN THE CONSTRUCTION OF FISHING VESSELS

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I ask the Presiding Officer to lay before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives on H.R. 5421.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives announcing its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 5421) to provide a program of assistance to correct inequities in the construction of fishing vessels and to enable the fishing industry of the United States to regain favorable economic status, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendment, agree to the request of the House for a conference, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. MAGNUSON, Mr. PASTORE, Mr. THURMOND, Mr. ENGLE, Mr. BUTLER, and Mr. SCOTT conferees on the part of the Senate.

CONGRESSIONAL ACTION ON INTEREST RATES NEEDED

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, in furtherance of the remarks made by the distinguished Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BUSH], I wish to invite attention to the fact that in his first state of the Union message last week and in his special message to Congress on Tuesday of this week, President Eisenhower renewed his request for action to remove the arbitrary and unnecessary interest rate ceiling on long-term Government bonds.

Mr. President, today I believe it to be of the highest importance that the President's request on interest rates be granted. I stated my views on this matter on the floor of the Senate several times during the last session.

Let me briefly restate this position:

The United States is fortunately in the midst of an impressive economic boom. The demand for investment capital is great, and as a result interest rates have increased. Why not? Ours is a free competitive economy and that is the way it works.

The Government meanwhile has a debt, and it must sell bonds. Like everyone else, the Government must sell its obligations at the current asking price for the real savings of our economy—whatever that price may be.

Following this thinking through to the logical conclusion, it is apparent that if, in a free economy, the asking price for investment capital—that is, for the real savings in our economy is above 4¼ percent, the Government rate on long-term securities must also be above 4¼ percent.

Opponents of the removal of the 4¼ percent ceiling on long-term bonds contend that raising the interest rate is inflationary. This simply is not true. In fact, the opposite is the case.

As is well known, the interest rate ceiling currently prevents the Treasury from selling any long-term bonds. Full reliance must be placed on short-term notes on which there is no interest rate ceiling. Government notes now sell for rates of 5 percent or more. These notes represent what is called "near money," which means that savings used to buy Government notes are much more liquid. They can be quickly and easily converted into cash, and as a result, there is more money in use or immediately available for use in our economy. This situation is clearly inflationary.

On the other hand, if the Treasury could sell long-term bonds at the market price, the savings in our economy would not be so fluid and for this reason inflationary pressures would be more easily held in check.

Mr. President, I want to invite attention this morning to a New York Times editorial which was published while Congress was in recess. I have been saving this editorial because I think it states the President's case for removal of the interest rate limit in very strong and very clear terms.

The Times refers to the blocking of the President's request as "obstructionism." The editorial goes on to point out that developments in our economy over the past year clearly demonstrate the wisdom of the President's request for the removal of the interest rate ceiling.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the New York Times editorial be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Jan. 4, 1960]

RETURN TO REASON?

Secretary of the Treasury Robert B. Anderson, speaking before a joint annual meeting of two of the Nation's leading economic associations in Washington, returned to the prevailing arbitrary interest rate ceiling of 4¼ percent on Treasury bonds. The administration, he said, will press Congress "with all the vigor that we can command" for prompt action on the issue.

Feeling has mounted against this piece of obstructionism since the adjournment of the last session of Congress as an increasing number of people have come to understand the significance of the action by the congressional opposition. The consensus now seems to be that the next session will see the opponents of the President's request bow to changed public opinion and retreat from their earlier, misguided position.

This view would seem to be confirmed by the staff report to the joint congressional committee, which says:

"While the interest rate ceiling should be repealed, modification of the policies that led to this situation is a matter of much more pressing importance. Whether the Congress will want to repeal it without basic reforms in fiscal, monetary, and debt management policy is a matter for it to decide."

This was not written in a spirit of "let the chips fall where they may" and without reference to the position in which the Democratic caucus made its important decision a few months earlier, and it is not written in a spirit of contrition. It is written, one is compelled to conclude, with the idea of saving the faces of the group of Senators that was largely responsible for putting the party out on a long and insecure limb and would very much like to climb back with a minimum loss of dignity.

EDWIN C. JOHNSON

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, few men who have served the United States in this Chamber have achieved so remarkable a record as Edwin C. Johnson. Ed Johnson continues to lend his efforts to the betterment of the Nation and of his native State even though he is now enjoying retirement.

New recognition of his great efforts was recently accorded him by the Department of Colorado, Veterans of Foreign Wars, at their 39th annual department convention last June when they issued him a citation.

I ask unanimous consent that the citation be printed in full in the RECORD so that his friends may read anew of the accomplishments of Ed Johnson, a constant friend of the servicemen and the veterans.

There being no objection, the citation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CITATION

In recognition of his lifetime service to his Nation, his State and to his fellow man and his outstanding accomplishments in legislation for the veteran, his widow and dependents: His untiring efforts on behalf of the individual veteran and his sympathetic interest and understanding of the problems of the defenders of our country.

In witness whereof we have hereunto set our hands and the official seal of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, Department of Colorado; this 20th day of June 1959.

NEIL BLACK,
Department Commander.
AMOS B. CLARK, Department Adjutant.

Whereas it is the policy of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States to recognize the service of an individual to our Nation, our State, our disabled veteran and our great organization, and

Whereas in Colorado we have such a man, who, down through the years, has been an outstanding legislator and fellow citizen who has always been ready, willing, and eager to help the veteran, his widow and dependents, and

Whereas we believe the service he has rendered to the veteran, and veteran organizations and his many acts in helping individuals, many of them members of our organization, goes far beyond the call of duty, and

Whereas he is retired from active service as a U.S. Senator and Governor of our great State: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That Ray Jr. Brannaman Post No. 3971, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, in regular meeting assembled in Denver, Colo., this 26th day of May 1959, hereby recognize the outstanding service of this great American, the Honorable Edwin C. Johnson, to his Nation, State, the individual veteran, and veteran organizations, and hereby awards a special citation expresive of the appreciation of the Veterans of Foreign Wars; and be it further

Resolved, That this resolution be forwarded to the department of Colorado, Veterans of Foreign Wars 39th Convention, to be held in Walsenburg, Colo., June 17–20, 1959, for approval and that the Veterans of Foreign Wars, department of Colorado issue the citation to be presented to this great American at a meeting suitable for the occasion.

ECONOMIC STRATEGY IN THE COLD WAR

Mr. JAVITS. I should like to call the attention of the Senate to two items on the ticker this morning which deserve careful reading by every Member of the Senate. The first deals with Chairman Khrushchev's speech in Moscow, in which he promises to reduce the conventional armed forces of Russia, and at the same time makes some very big statements about new atomic and hydrogen weapons which are available to the U.S.S.R.

It seems to me that this emphasizes the policy debate and the strategy debate which is now going on in the free world on how we can deal with the continuing East-West struggle. Many people, including myself, are convinced that this struggle is phasing out of its previous basis of strictly military competition, subversion, and various types of aggression, and is now phasing into a new and historic economic struggle, especially beamed to the less developed areas of the world.

What Mr. Khrushchev is in effect reiterating is that the new weapons have become so terrible from the standpoint of the devastation which they would wreak upon the countries of the world and have become so devastating that it is most unlikely that these weapons would be used. The result is that in my view the rulers of the Soviet Union, as the free world should, believe that the way to win the world is through the economic struggle.

It is especially significant, therefore, when a great American, like Douglas Dillon, the Under Secretary of State, who is in Paris now, can bring about a marked development toward a more effective integration of the free world and toward making a beginning of a posture for doing the job which needs to be done within itself.

I believe it will mean a very decisive victory over communism that the free world can protect itself effectively in the economic field and bring itself to the highest standards mankind has ever known, and bring along on that road the less developed areas of the world.

It is with great gratification that I announce this news, that the 18 European nations and the United States and Canada, the most powerful industrial complex in the world, have approved our plan, the American plan, of linking both sides of the Atlantic in an organization for economic cooperation, aid, and trade. Also, this new organization to deal with the problems of Europe, which is at odds—not in an invidious sense, but in terms of peaceful trade—through the two blocs of countries, and further to deal with the problem of getting more aid to the less developed areas from the whole group of 20 nations and other industrial nations.

I close by expressing considerable gratification that the Congress participates in the work of the NATO Parliamentary Conference, which met here in Washington last November, and of which I have the honor to be chairman of its economic committee; and that this idea of integrating further economically the free world and doing the job that ought to be done by the industrial countries of the world, including the United States and Canada, had its origin in the work of the NATO Parliamentary Conference, and, I say with pardonable pride, in the resolutions of its economic committee.

It is proof of the fact that parliamentary representatives can have a responsibility for work which results in constructive international statecraft.

THE RUSSIAN MISSILE TEST IN THE PACIFIC

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, at his press conference yesterday the President made clear that he has no intention of protesting the Russian missile tests in the Pacific. His statement was tempered and reasoned and the position he has taken now becomes the official position of the United States. Nevertheless, I must respectfully suggest that in my opinion the Russian action, coming as it does, in the interim before the first summit conference is provocative.

To say that we have used the Pacific for the same purpose in the past begs the question. Times change and, presumably, people are capable of learning from experience. Right now, the world is trying to get a summit meeting to ease tensions. This Russian action, coming at this time and in this place and in the manner in which it was announced serves only to heighten the tensions.

To say further that the Russians' test in the Pacific is legal under international law is only to underscore the inadequacy of international law and to point up the need for action to remedy this defect.

The use of the high seas, no less than outer space, for dangerous scientific tests is bound to increase drastically from now on. Not only Russia, the United States and Britain will be involved. So will other nations. As regards outer space we are trying to get an agreement, not to stop tests, but to regulate them in the best interests of all mankind. As regards the high seas, we are not doing a thing. Yet the high seas are of more immediate importance to all nations than is outer space.

The rights of all nations are involved in the use of the high seas for a test such as the Russians are about to conduct as well as the ones we ourselves are conducting, even though they take place under every possible precaution. Fishing areas which are presumably open to all nations are closed and may be permanently damaged. Surface and air transport which is open to all nations is impeded. The lives and property of persons may be imperiled.

An agreement is essential if we are to protect the rights of peoples, including our own, to the peaceful and equal use, not only of the Pacific but of all the oceans. Unless we get an agreement of this kind, the free seas will become increasingly the scene of "no trespassing" or "pass at your own risk" signs placed there against all other nations by whatever nation chooses to do so at any given moment. All this will be justified in the name of science.

I respectfully suggest to the administration that the place to work toward such an agreement is in the United Nations.

I respectfully suggest to the administration that it not allow this problem to fester by inaction.

This Nation ought to take the question to the United Nations now as a matter of urgency and as an initiative for peace.

CUBAN THREAT TO NICKEL PRODUCTION

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. President, at Port Nickel, La., the $45 million installation is capable of turning out 50 million pounds of nickel and 4.4 million pounds of cobalt a year from the raw commodity which comes from Cuba. Although this installation was completed last September, there has been virtually no production because of the turmoil which has occurred in Cuba during the past year. The Government of Cuba has adopted punitive tax measures and has caused the expropriation of American property, so that there is little, if any, cooperation between the Government of Cuba and firms in the United States and our own Government in the observance of contracts which have been negotiated in the past.

This development shows the uncertainties of the policy of depending upon foreign sources for our minerals, and likewise emphasizes the essential need of stabilizing our own minerals industry.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD an article entitled, "Cuban 'Reform' Spells Cobwebs for a Nickel Refinery in Louisiana," written by James C. Tanner, and published in the Wall Street Journal of today.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CUBAN "REFORM" SPELLS COBWEBS FOR A NICKEL REFINERY IN LOUISIANA—EXPORT TAX, SEIZURE THREAT BAR FLOW OF ISLAND'S ORE TO FREEPORT SULFUR PLANT

(By James C. Tanner)

PORT NICKEL, LA.—Hard by the Gulf of Mexico and just off the east bank of the meandering Mississippi here, a big refinery made up of towers, tanks, spheres, and intricate machinery sprawls over much of a 220-acre tract.

The $45 million installation is capable of turning out 50 million pounds of nickel and 4.4 million pounds of cobalt a year—in tiny and shiny chunks similar in size and shape to charcoal briquettes. It's part of a grandiose plan to dent the nickel markets of International Nickel Co., a Canadian concern. The plant's owner, Freeport Nickel Co., a subsidiary of Freeport Sulfur Co., has billed it as "the new nickel-cobalt capital of the United States."

But, since it opened in early September, the "capital" has turned out only a trickle of nickel—and that in test runs—because of confusion in Castro's Cuba.

The plant here is designed to process only a specific type of nickel-cobalt ore from deposits in Cuba, where Freeport, through another subsidiary, Moa Bay Mining Co., has invested another $75 million. So far, Port Nickel still awaits the Cuban shipments.

CONSTRUCTION DELAYS

Construction delays at the Moa Bay end have been partly responsible for the lack of raw material here. But a number of other factors make Freeport hesitant to step up its Cuban operations and start shipping big quantities of ore from Cuba to Port Nickel. For one thing, there's Cuba's hefty new 25 percent tax on all minerals exported. There's also the threat of Cuban Government expropriation of the Moa Bay facility. Or Cuba may insist on buying Mao Bay's output for pesos—and reselling it to Freeport for U.S. dollars.

The upshot: Even though the Port Nickel project initially was scheduled to get into operation last summer as this country's leading producer of both metals, the refinery stands idle. A skeleton crew maintains the machinery here. Cobwebs can be seen on some of the costly and silent devices. A stone's throw away, a Liberty ship converted to bring in the raw material in slurry form is docked, empty, on the Mississippi.

Several other U.S. concerns, of course, also have felt the backlash of Fidel Castro's reforms. Some, such as Texas' King Ranch, have lost lands in Cuba. Others, such as International Telephone & Telegraph Co., have seen their Cuban subsidiaries taken over by the state. Still others, such as Gulf Oil Corp., are pulling out of Cuba despite sizable investments there. Gulf just this week announced it was ending petroleum exploration on the island.

All told, U.S. companies have more than $800 million invested in Cuba, and many of them fear that their properties are in jeopardy.

NICKEL CLOSER TO HOME

Freeport's frustration, though, is worth a close look. For one thing, it involves one of the biggest single U.S. investments in Cuba—partly financed, incidentally, by four

U.S. steel companies and two automobile concerns who had hoped to get a nickel source closer to home.

Both cobalt and nickel have wide defense uses. Nickel, for example, is a prime ingredient of electronics components, jetplanes and missiles.

Nickel is combined with steel to produce stainless steel. Nickel also adds extra strength to steel. It's used in auto bumpers, and in telephones, television sets and toasters.

A leading consumer of the metal, the United States at times has faced acute shortages of nickel. Free world production totals around 450 million pounds a year, most of it from Canada.

Other lands boasting nickel deposits include New Caledonia, the Philippines, Indonesia, Brazil, Venezuela, and the Union of South Africa. Freeport's nickel authorities aver the most important reserves are in Cuba, and some studies have calculated reserves there as six times as large as Canada's.

When Christopher Columbus sailed into Moa Bay in Oriente Province on the northeast coast of Cuba on his first voyage to the New World in 1492, he noted the red-tinted coastal hills and jotted in his journal that he detected signs of valuable minerals.

Some 400 years later, Cuban and U.S. engineers roaming the same Oriente hills, some 450 miles east of Havana, turned up iron ore in vast quantities. U.S. steel companies sought to mine the ore but found that it was contaminated with nickel and chrome and that it made brittle steel.

A quarter of a century ago, Freeport, today one of the Nation's big sulfur producers, had manganese operations in Cuba and became interested in the iron ore as a source of nickel and cobalt. It developed processes to break the ore down to produce the contained metals as separate products.

THE B–70 DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, during December, the Bureau of the Budget recommended that the B–70 program be so stepped down that I feel the entire program will be seriously endangered. I wish I had been on the floor the other day when this matter was discussed, because it has been of great concern to me.

It is very rarely that I disagree with the Director of the Bureau of the Budget or with the President himself so far as matters of economy are concerned, but I cannot agree that the elimination or the cutting down of the B–70 program will be advantageous to this country.

The B–70 is a brand new idea in aerodynamics. It is an airplane which, in my opinion, must be built. I do not agree with those who say that the piloted airplane is on the way out. There will be men in the cockpits of planes so long as men fly. The B–70 airplane has the capability of Mach–3. It has the capability of flying three times faster than sound, and can fly at an altitude of 80,000 feet. For those reasons alone, if for no other reasons, and whether this plane ever carries the H-bomb or not, the United States should proceed with research on the B–70.

From the military standpoint, the B–70 would make obsolete the present fighter force of Soviet Russia. The altitude capabilities of the Russian planes do not exceed 60,000 feet. I seriously doubt that they exceed 50,000 feet. Thus, possession of the B–70 would make it impossible for an interceptor to reach the altitude at which this bomber would fly.

According to the information I have, the B–70 would make obsolete almost all the surface-to-air missiles which Soviet Russia has, because none of them has an altitude capability of 60,000 feet. Here, again, with a target flying at 80,000 feet, it would be impossible for an interceptor to hit it.

We should develop not only the airplane, because the air frame and its power system are only a part of the whole program, but we should develop new concepts of navigational systems for a plane flying at the speed of which the B–70 is capable, a plane which will reduce the travel time from the United States to Russian targets from 6½ hours to less than 3 hours. The B–70 is a plane which will make it possible, if used in commercial transport, for one to have breakfast in New York and to arrive in Los Angeles an hour before breakfast is served there. Or, it could take off from New York and fly west, with the moon already having set in New York, and land in Los Angeles with the moon still shining.

Along with that, it will be necessary to develop electronic counter measures, because the present ones cannot work in an aircraft of this speed. It will be necessary also to develop new bombing systems for aircraft of this speed.

I disagree with the Budget Bureau on the position it has taken in this respect, and I have written to the President, urging him to reconsider the action which has been taken, in the hope that we can proceed with the development of the B–70 program.

Mr. President, in this connection, an excellent article entitled "The Gutting of the Valkyrie," written by Ed Mack Miller, was published in Air Force magazine for January 1960. I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE GUTTING OF THE VALKYRIE

(By Ed Mack Miller)

Congress and the American people now stand as the last hope for continued American supremacy in the skies of the world. Their prompt response and action can yet save a vital weapon system, essential to U.S. survival. Early last month the Department of Defense announced that the B–70 bomber program had been "reoriented."

A better word might have been "gutted."

The Air Force reluctantly and with grave apprehension bowed to what was essentially a political decision in a budget-balancing atmosphere.

From the time the intercontinental ballistic missile entered the military picture, our military strategists have talked and planned in terms of the "weapon mix," a combination of missiles and manned weapon systems which would function together for years to come. This has been considered the best approach to the keeping of the peace through deterrence.

In addition, it has been generally agreed that the complexity and high cost of military weapons required us to take the longest possible look forward in their planning and then schedule concurrency of systems development so that at a given date the pieces could be jigged together to form the finest and most advanced product obtainable. No more of World War II's mating of a new flight platform with whatever bombing, navigation, and armament hardware was on hand at a given time.

But implicit in the deep-cutting B–70 decision was the negation of both the plane-missile "mix" philosophy and the hard-come-by weapon-system concept. As matters now stand, with many B–70 subsystems canceled outright, ECM, bombing, and navigation black boxes for the B–70, if needed, would have to be adapted from the B–52. None of them is truly adequate for a Mach 3 airplane.

The B–70, if the decision stands, will not be a bomber, only a "barebone" airplane. Only two reoriented B–70's are planned; perhaps no others will ever be built. Under current conditions, it will have none of the subsystems to make it work effectively as a bomber. And in a year or so it will be easy to kill the B–70 completely, on the grounds that it is not a useful vehicle without these subsystems.

One fact above all stands out in the wake of the fiscally dictated B–70 decision. The Washington Post stated it well in a front-page story on December 3:

"The Pentagon decision to delay and reorient the B–70 bomber is far more than a mere defense stretchout. It means the end of the 2,000-mile-an-hour plane as a bomber, and apparently the end of the line for manned strategic bombers. * * * It is important to recognize the Defense Department's B–70 announcement for what it is—not the postponement of a new bomber, but its demise."

Can the free world afford to be without a manned bomber in its future? Can we truly afford to eliminate the highly trained human being, with his established mastery of the sky, from our national defense equation? These questions were left unanswered in the dollar-haunted atmosphere hanging heavy over Washington.

The North American B–70 Valkyrie strategic bomber is perhaps the most imaginative and sophisticated airplane ever designed.

The B–70's designed dimensions are not far from those of the B–52. It fits into a B–52 hangar. But in other ways the Valkyrie would be a radical departure. Authentic artists' conceptions endow it with a spaceship quality.

Its long gooseneck, peacock tail, canard control "ears," and tapered body give it the appearance of being, in the words of one observer, "supersonic just sitting still."

Some of the most daring features ever proposed have gone into its design, which is now firm. One primary (and secret) element of its aerodynamic configuration is described as "more important" even than the area-rule ("coke bottle") design that made the Convair F–102 Delta Dagger supersonic.

Because of this design breakthrough, the B–70 was the first plane scheduled to cruise at top speed for its entire mission instead of cruising to the vicinity of the target subsonically and then going supersonic in a brief dash (at high fuel penalties) like the Convair B–58 Hustler bomber.

Powered by six General Electric J–93 engines with a total of more than 150,000 pounds of thrust, the B–70 was designed to cruise at up to 80,000 feet, with a range of more than 6,000 miles without refueling in flight. A crew of four could man the roughly 170-foot-long and 115-foot wide plane, which would have a maximum takeoff weight of about 250 tons.

The B–70 has been designed to operate with ordinary jet fuel, although for a time it appeared that exotic fuels, such as boron types, would give even better performance. A USAF-Navy program for such "zip" fuel was canceled in August on the verge of completion, then reinstated on a much-diminished scale last month in line with high-energy rocket programing.

Living-room comfort has been designed into the B–70. There would be no need for air crewmen to wear pressure suits, oxygen masks, parachutes, or the like. The plane, able to fly at some 15 miles above the earth at about 2,000 miles an hour, with a 10-megaton hydrogen bomb, would provide its four-man crew with optimum cabin conditions in terms of temperature, pressure, and elbow room.

The B–70 would "encapsulate" the individual. In an emergency, the capsule would eject, its chute opening at a preset altitude. The capsule would be equipped with a boat for water landings, and clothing and food suitable for such extremes as arctic or desert survival.

The name "Valkyrie" was selected for the B–70 in a Strategic Air Command naming contest. More than 20,000 names were submitted. In Norse mythology, the Valkyrie were maidens of extreme beauty who ranged the heavens on their steeds, choosing those who were to die in battle and bearing the fallen heroes back to Valhalla.

Originally known as Weapon System 110-A, the Valkyrie represented one of the greatest breakthroughs in the history of aircraft development.

The breakthrough was explained by Dr. Hugh L. Dryden, then Director of the now-defunct National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, before the House Appropriations Committee in February of 1958.

Said Dr. Dryden: "About a year ago, a strange and wonderful thing happened. It was as if the pieces of a jigsaw puzzle began falling into place. Almost simultaneously, research programs that had been under way at the NACA labs in Virginia, California, and Ohio began to pay off. The result—this is an oversimplification, but it is not an overstatement—was that the companies and the Air Force suddenly realized it would not be much harder to design a long-range bomber that could fly its whole mission supersonic than to design one that would fly subsonic most of the way, and only a small fraction of the flight supersonic. Not only that, but the top speed of the prospective bomber was raised to Mach 3—about 2,000 miles per hour."

Constructed of titanium stainless steel, and nickel-base alloy, the B–70 has been designed to hit the heart of Russia in less than 3 hours after takeoff. It could use existing airbases in the SAC system, or even civilian fields like Idlewild in New York, Friendship between Washington, D.C., and Baltimore, or San Francisco International.

The B–70's 250-ton gross weight for takeoff would be about the same as that of a B–52, its landing speed actually slower than that of the North American F–100 Super Sabre fighter, its range and speed such as to take it around the world (with inflight refueling) in less than half a day. At higher speeds, the B–70's wingtips were designed to turn down 50° to provide better stability.

How fast is Mach 3? This fast. At such a speed, you could eat breakfast in New York at 8 o'clock, then take off and arrive in Los Angeles an hour and a half before you ate.

In fact, flying west in the B–70 you could make the sun set in the east or bring the moon back up once it had set in the west.

Actually, the B–70 would have so much speed that it would take a tremendous defensive system to cope with it. The plane would move more than 30 miles per minute. At that rate, any errors in quick calculation the enemy might make would compound immediately. A 10-minute warning or computation delay would find the B–70 some 300 miles further along its route—streaking close to the earth's skin, below effective radar coverage, or so high no ground-based weapon could hit it.

The B–70 at this writing is not a mere dream. Far from it. The plane and its components were in detailed design stage and tooling design when the gutting was announced. A mockup of the plane is in existence at North American's plant at Inglewood, Calif.

But USAF's trisonic "packaged offensive" will probably never be capable of functioning as the superb machine it was designed to be, even when the "barebone" plane is flying. Contracts for the following subsystems were effectively cut away, although in some cases the contractors will proceed with the projects involved on their own hook:

Radar, to have been produced by General Electric with the ability to discriminate between two closely spaced objects at a great distance and possessed of powerful antijamming characteristics.

A sophisticated new bombing-navigation system by International Business Machines, incorporating modular design and allowing for inflight maintenance.

A new central air-data system to have been produced by the Garrett Corp.'s AiResearch Division.

An extremely advanced electronic countermeasures system to be developed by Westinghouse.

Motorola's new mission and traffic-control system.

Beech Aircraft's special power pod.

All major subcontracts for airframe were returned to North American, the plane's prime contractor, in last month's move. Wing production had been in the hands of Boeing Aircraft, stabilizer production assigned to Chance Vought, and upper fuselage development to Lockheed Aircraft.

Under examination, with a possibility of being reduced, are those held by United Aircraft's Hamilton Standard Division (air-induction control and environmental systems); Sperry (gyro platform); Sundstrand Aviation (secondary power system); Cleveland Pneumatic Industries, Inc. (landing gear); and John Oster Manufacturing Co. (powerplant instrumentation).

Fighting a rear-guard action against the budgeteers, the Air Force is investigating alternative uses for the aircraft itself. Even for purposes other than as a bomb platform, the Valkyrie shapes up as a potent piece of flying hardware.

The B–70 could be a—

Supersonic transport.

Moneysaving recoverable booster for space projects, including the Dynasoar test vehicle.

Space interceptor to query and investigate foreign satellites in orbit.

Ballistic missile launcher.

Supersonic nuclear-powered aircraft.

The B–70 could be a first-rate military transport. It could deliver war materials to any point on earth in only a few hours. In a limited war, this would provide an immediate show of strength, with great potential as a diplomatic tool in backing up foreign policy. If the United Nations ever gains a police force, someone suggested the B–70 could be an ideally effective global police cruiser, the "cop on the beat" worldwide.

The Valkyrie was designed to deliver anything—the biggest hydrogen bomb, air-launched ballistic missiles (ALBM's), a train-load of standard bombs, a series of hydrogen bombs for primary, secondary, and tertiary targets, or a combination of bombs and missiles for sequence attacks. The B–70 could become a tremendous launching platform, taking orbital or space-probe vehicles to the edge of the atmosphere before launching.

From a practical, commercial point of view the B–70 represents almost a quantum jump in the state of the aeronautical art. The world has merely scratched the surface of the potential of air transport. Someone, somewhere, eventually is going to build a Mach 3 transport. And, like most of the technical developments that have brought commercial aviation to where it is today, the money invested in the B–70 would have considerable commercial fallout.

A Mach 3 transport could whisk passengers from coast to coast in little more than an hour, from Honolulu to Denver in less than 3 hours, and from New York to Paris in the same time.

But perhaps the greatest danger in eliminating the B–70 from our future weapons inventory is the negation of the principle of the mixed force, thereby eliminating versatility and flexibility from our future deterrent strength.

A meaningful SAC motto says, "We must strive for the greatest technical advance—consistent with continuous capability." In other words, reach, but not so far that you trip.

Intercontinental ballistic missiles and manned intercontinental bombing systems are not competing but complementary. Each has inherent disadvantages which cancel out each other in a mixed force whereas they are compounded in a force wedded to one or the other on an "either-or" basis. Missiles can do things a bomber cannot do and vice versa.

Put together in a mixed force they mean that the prospective enemy cannot rest easy until he has effected a counter to any and all combinations of weapons. Narrow the field of your own choices in delivery systems and you make the enemy's defensive job commensurately easier and immeasurably cheaper.

The manned bomber is selective. It can, in effect, turn its head and peek out of the corners of its eyes. The ICBM cannot. The bomber weapon system can also radar-map the destruction a raid has caused and return with information to plan a subsequent mission. There is little guesswork in the assessment of the damage it does.

One of the big drawbacks of an all-missile force is the question of quick dispatch without recall. For instance, if the DEW line radar warning net were to pick up blips heading over the pole from Russia, the question would be this: Should we launch our ICBM's? Remember, the blips could be meteor showers, northern lights, migratory birds, or ice-packed clouds. Would we want to start a war by mistake? But they could be attackers. We'd probably wait. * * *

For once the missile goes, it can't be recalled—only destroyed, an expensive undertaking. A few planned spoofs by Red strategists actually could cause depletion of our stockpile of missiles.

The bomber force can go even to the point of preparation for bombdrop and still be recalled, with the only expenditure being fuel.

Under national policy, missiles will be launched only with the permission of the President. Bombers can be dispatched without his OK—because they can always be recalled.

With the gutting of the B–70, many knowledgeable persons have stated in recent weeks, we have allowed ourselves to be stampeded by incessant Soviet propaganda which says that all manned weapons are obsolescent. From the size and technical improvement of Red aircraft, it would appear that the Communist world itself is far from giving up on manned airplanes. There is a good chance, in fact, that Russia is today developing her own Mach 3 bomber.

It can easily be seen how we could play into Communist hands by concentrating exclusively on missile hardware. Their defensive strategy and logistics problems would be immeasurably simplified by such a decision on our part.

It has been suggested that one of the neatest tricks the Reds could pull would be to let us put all our nuclear eggs in one missile basket—and then proclaim to the world that they would use only conventional weapons if war came. The propaganda coup would be hard to offset. We would be effectively handcuffed until we could get back into production of nonnuclear weapons—and extremely vulnerable in the interim.

Farfetched? Perhaps, but it illustrates the position we are getting ourselves into by the apparent trend of administration defense thinking.

If the Soviet hordes broke across the NATO countries, we would face another terrible decision, if missiles were our only weapon. Should we fire our nuclear "big birds," possibly even into friendly countries, to combat this Soviet aggression? This would be a fateful step. A versatile manned aircraft striking force with pinpoint bombing capabilities—especially with the capability of switching to nonnuclear warheads —could strike the enemy effectively. Again the advantage of the mixed force.

In this regard, Gen. Thomas D. White, Chief of Staff of the Air Force, recently said, "Manned aircraft will continue to be a military requirement in the foreseeable future. Ballistic missiles and other manned vehicles are not as yet, and may never be, the solution to all military problems."

The B–70, of course, would not be immune to enemy counterattack, but our past experience has shown us that "a weapon developed and produced at the limit of the nation's technological capability will be a competitive weapon in the planned time period." There is no reason to suppose that our B–70 would not be able to more than hold its own against any defense the enemy could throw up against it for quite a few years to come. Even if the enemy's defense "caught up" (at immense cost to him, it might be added), the Valkyrie would remain an immensely potent fighting machine with a great likelihood of outfighting or outthinking an opponent to perform its mission.

By way of analogy, the Nazi fighter planes of World War II were a highly effective countermeasure for our Flying Fortresses, but the U.S. airman and his machine, competing against these defenses, won out.

It would seem, too, that the B–70 could make our investment in ICBM's pay off with dividends. The bomber force could reach enemy territory, in the event of hostilities, shortly after our first barrage of ICBM's. The B–70's would be able to assess the damage and clean up targets before the enemy could recover from the first shock of the missile attack.

It is an axiom of military history that the only thing you know for sure about the next war is that it won't be fought the way you plan it now.

Many top strategists believe that it would be utter folly for us to base our force requirements on a sudden and conclusive exchange of nuclear missiles. Especially when we have officially created a missile gap. An insufficient missile force could leave us fearfully unprepared. Versatility may not assume victory, but rigidity will almost certainly assure defeat.

An effective use of the B–70 would be against mobile targets, including truck or train-transported missiles. Another type of target would be that for which we do not have accurate geographical coordinates. In other words, it could do what we suddenly found it had to do without massive advance planning.

An extremely important advantage of the B–70, in addition, is this: Merely the building of the B–70 in sufficient numbers would force the Soviets to enlarge their commitment for home defense. It would cost them more to defend against the B–70 than it would cost us to build the plane. And because the Reds also have budget problems, it would penalize their strategic offensive force, aiding our own security. In fact, the B–70 fiasco may well prove an economic bonanza for the Kremlin, preventing the obsolescence of thousands of their fighters and other elements of their air defense system. It is Russia, not the United States, that can't afford the B–70.

"To prevail," said the great military philosopher Von Clausewitz, "apply force in the right amount, at the right place, at the right time."

The B–70 can do just that—with maximum efficiency.

For this reason it will behoove the Senators and the Representatives of the United States to reevaluate the B–70 program when Congress reconvenes.

It could be their last chance to rectify a grave error.

As one civilian expert said, "In Government today, we are so organized that military decisions made by the best military experience are subject to veto by well meaning businessmen who frequently are on a part-time basis with the Government."

In the opinion of the majority of the men who work daily with the defense problems of the country, defensive missiles are not yet ready to assume full responsibility for defense of the Nation. Yet the North American F–108 Rapier, a Mach 3 interceptor, was canceled outright in September. A few weeks earlier, Lt. Gen. Joseph D. Atkinson, commander, Air Defense Command, declared in a speech at AFA's 1959 convention that a Mach 3 fighter was a "must."

Now comes the B–70 gutting. The Air Force still hopes to revive development of the B–70 as an essential strategic weapon, not a bare test bed with possible eventual uses as a supersonic transport, nuclear-powered aircraft, recoverable booster, or satellite interceptor. Reinstated in the next few months, the B–70 program could still yield operational weapon systems in line with earlier scheduling.

As a bomber, the B–70 is vital to the defense of this country because, to quote one design expert, "It has uninhibited response, it can be tailored to force application, it is dispersable, it has utility, it has convertibility, and it has recallability."

If it dies, one top Air Force officer said bluntly after the DOD announcement, the concept of true national preparedness may die with it.

In sum, what are we, as a nation, on the verge of throwing away if we permit the B–70 program to go down the fiscal drainpipe?

1. We are committing SAC to a subsonic manned retaliatory force for the indeterminate future.

2. We are committing our military planners to a rigid, inflexible force structure which inevitably will make a mockery of our deterrent posture.

3. We are contenting ourselves with second place in the advancement of the state of the aeronautical art. It is quite certain that the Soviet Union will have a supersonic jet transport in service before we do. Now, we are handing them preeminence in the Mach 3 range as well, in the same manner that we are playing second fiddle (or perhaps piccolo) in space. One Air Force planner phrased it bitterly:

"One day," he said, "your kids and mine will be flying in a Mach 3 airplane, but chances are it will have the hammer and sickle on the rudder."

4. We will save $85 million in fiscal year 1961—about one-fiftieth of 1 percent of our defense spending.

Fortunately there is yet time to correct this tragic blunder. The Congress has yet to meet, and it will have a duty to turn its searching spotlight on the reasoning behind the B–70 decision. Public opinion is still the final arbiter in this democracy of ours, even though it must grope through the obfuscating fog of fiscal scaremongers to reach the facts.

It is an open secret in Washington that the B–70 program has long been the target of the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, Mr. Stans. He claims we cannot afford it. Whether the taxpayer would agree, if he knew the facts, is another story.

We almost lost the B–17 many years ago on the grounds of economy. Atlas, key of our missile force and currently of our space program, fell under the budgeteers' broad ax and was kept alive with the contractor's money. Word is that some B–70 contractors are willing to exhibit similar faith in their mission.

It is not too late for decisive action, but the time grows perilously short.

STEEL: HOW INFLATIONARY?

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, a truly excellent editorial appears in the current issue of Life magazine—that for January 18, 1960. It is entitled "Steel: How Inflationary?"

The editorial contains words of praise for the excellent public service rendered by the Vice President and by others in the steel controversy. It comments that, in the opinion of participants to the settlement of the dispute, the Vice President proved himself to be a true mediator. The article contains the comforting assurance that the settlement "is the least inflationary steel settlement since the war." It states:

The cost increase is about 3½ percent per year, as against a previously habitual 8 percent.

The editorial contains, however, a stern warning to the men of steel—management and labor, alike. It relates how, after the settlement or the accord was reached, an American manufacturing establishment—the Joy Manufacturing Co., producing heavy mining and industrial machinery—decided to go ahead, in Australia, with a new plant which makes the cheapest steel in the world. "If the American steel industry does not keep its costs competitive," says Life, "there will be a lot of unemployed steelworkers before long." I agree. And the hazard of foreign competition, along with our own public opinion, ought to supply all the incentive necessary for American steel to produce more, and more efficiently, and to keep the price down.

I ask unanimous consent that the editorial be printed at this point in the RECORD, in connection with my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STEEL: HOW INFLATIONARY?

The steel strike was settled by the President, the Vice President, and Secretary Mitchell; theirs the credit or the blame. According to steel men, NIXON proved "a true mediator" and a very well-informed one. With Mitchell's help, he even worked out the actual terms of the agreement. It provides for two wage increases in the next 2½ years, plus other benefits that bring the cumulative cost to around 40 cents an hour, or $1 billion in all. It is generally felt that labor won this costly argument.

As Life has stated repeatedly during this longest of nationwide steel strikes, the chief public interest has been that the outcome be noninflationary. United States Steel's Roger Blough promised that if the White House kept its nose out of the negotiations, he would reach a noninflationary settlement. But the administration did intervene and the terms, according to Blough, "could hardly be regarded as noninflationary." By this reasoning the public interest (and the steel companies) have taken a licking.

But that is not the whole story. The collective bargaining process had broken down. Had there been no Government intervention, the strike would probably have resumed on January 26, with its mounting costs in lost wages and production (already over $6 billion) becoming the paramount aspect of the whole nasty mess. Hence Government intervention, far from subverting the public interest, saved it from a worse disaster. The NIXON settlement was almost certainly the best that could be secured under the circumstances.

How then did the circumstances get so unfavorable to the public interest? It is easy enough to blame Blough & Co. for bad generalship, for they were guilty of it. They omitted the chance to take the initiative from the union with a price cut (Life, May 18). The way they introduced their own demand for revision of the work rules won them minimum public sympathy and maximum union opposition (which they consistently underestimated). But when all that is said, the question remains whether the best generalship in the world could have defeated the union in this or any other steel strike, under present laws.

The union enjoys a legal monopoly of bargaining power for wages; and its strike weapon is more powerful than anything in management's arsenal. When labor wants a raise, the chief practical check on its demands is the moderation of its leaders. This is not the same thing as the public interest. If the public interest lies in little or no wage increase, as was the case in this strike, it can only win its point by curbing the monopolistic power of the unions.

No such legislative curbs are to be expected from Congress in an election year. This political fact of life was one of NIXON'S strongest arguments in getting Blough & Co. to agree to his settlement. In his state of the Union message the President put protracted strikes first among the nagging disorders that still afflict us. Yet instead of new legislation, he proposes to rely on the good commonsense of labor and management. A Pollyanna solution. But we had better make the best of it during this election year.

The settlement gives us nearly 3 years of peace in steel in which to bring its inflationary consequences under control. Moreover, it is the least inflationary steel settlement since the war. The cost increase is about 3½ percent per year, as against a previously habitual 8 percent; but also as against a 2½ percent annual increase in steel productivity. Thus its inflationary ingredient is about 1 percent. There lies the source of the wage-cost push which has forced prices up in so many industries, and in which steel has been the chief villain. Steel is no longer the chief villain. In fact the 1 percent can doubtless be absorbed without a price increase by the highly profitable rate of production in prospect for steel in 1960. But it will mean higher prices later unless labor and management now collaborate in increasing steel productivity still further. The work rules (on which a committee will report next November) are one means to do this.

Let's hope this collaborative effort gets results because it will have to. A new drillmaster of American costs has now entered the steel picture to stay: foreign competition. Right after the steel settlement, Joy Manufacturing Co. (heavy mining and industrial machinery) decided to go ahead with a new plant in Australia, which makes the cheapest steel in the world. Scores of other U.S. manufacturers are importing European steel, or building plants abroad, to avoid rising costs at home. If the American steel industry does not keep its costs competitive, there will be a lot of unemployed American steelworkers before long, and this is one thing the union cannot prevent. In this respect its interests are the same as management's. If good commonsense can't find this common interest, misfortune will teach it.

CHARLES A. CONNAUGHTON

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, the many people in California who know Charles A. Connaughton, the regional forester of the California region of the U.S. Forest Service, were delighted to learn, a few weeks ago, that he has been elected the president of the Society of American Foresters, a professional organization of foresters devoted to the cause of strengthening, on a nationwide basis, the work of forestry. Its membership of 13,000 includes persons from private industry, as well as persons from various governmental or public agencies.

Mr. Connaughton has been with the U.S. Forest Service, and a member of the society, for 30 years. He will serve as president of the society for the next 2-year term—1960 and 1961.

As a Californian, I am glad to salute a graduate of the University of Idaho, who thereafter obtained his master's degree in forestry at Yale University.

Mr. Connaughton has served in numerous posts with the U.S. Forest Service, including the directorship of two forest and range experiment stations.

He was regional forester for the southern region of the Forest Service, at Atlanta, Ga., before coming to my State of California as regional forester in 1955. There he has done, and continues to do, a splendid public service in a professional field; and I can only reiterate the pride of those who know him and have worked with him, on the recognition that is his due.

COAL-TO-GAS EVENTUALITY DRAMATIZES NEED FOR COAL RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I rise to speak bluntly but, I believe, factually.

Five days after the 1st session of the 86th Congress closed its deliberations, the President of the United States saw fit to veto the Coal Research and Development Commission Act, which had passed both the Senate and House of Representatives by very substantial majorities. In this body, Members on both sides of the aisle, including the illustrious minority leader, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], had joined in sponsoring this meritorious legislation.

Mr. President, it seems important to a State such as West Virginia and to contiguous States in which bituminous coal also is produced, and to other States which contain substantial deposits of bituminous coal, to have enacted again the basic legislation which was vetoed by the President. I am sure that during this session we shall have an opportunity again to pass a measure essentially of the type the President vetoed.

My particular attention is called today by a news story to the uses of coal. Of course, we are cognizant of the fact that during World War II, coal was the base for the high octane gasoline which fueled the aircraft of the Nazis. Now, we are face to face with a further development in the conversion of coal; I refer not to its conversion into gasoline, but also to its conversion into gas, itself.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks a news article entitled "Coal-for-Gas Use Predicted," from the Charleston Daily Mail of yesterday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit A.)

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, the article states that Fred A. Otto, the manager of the Belle works of the Du Pont Co., has explained in a challenging manner the opportunities for the gasification of coal. Mr. Otto made a rather startling statement which, of course, may not please Texans. He said the day will come when West Virginians will be piping gas back to Texas. In other words, he envisions the coming of a time when gas as a natural resource may be depleted; but in the same article we find that he indicated there are virtually inexhaustible supplies of coal under the mountains of West Virginia. He deplored the lack of detailed research in regard to the various fields of uses for bituminous coal, and he urged the need for concentration of effort immediately along such lines. He pointed out—and correctly so, I believe—the possibility of the conversion of coal into gas.

The President of the United States, in my judgment, acted upon bad advice when he pocket-vetoed the legislation to which I have directed your attention. The position he took had been tested in the form of the Allott amendment, which was defeated 56 to 27 in the Senate; yet the President vetoed the measure after Congress had adjourned and could not sustain or override that veto.

It is my belief that Senators of both parties will join with vigor in again presenting to the President a bill covering this vital area. I hope that after the facts have been made known to the President, he will realize that this is an obligation in which he can join with the Congress in fulfilling a challenge of creative action in developing a strengthened economy.

COAL-FOR-GAS USE PREDICTED

The day will come when West Virginia will be piping gas back to Texas.

Fred A. Otto, manager of the Belle plant of E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., made the prediction Tuesday at a meeting with representatives of news media at the plant.

But it will not be natural gas as Otto foresees it. That resource ultimately will be exhausted he said, and gas then will be made from coal taken from the virtually inexhaustible supply in the mountains of this State.

Otto said that by the gasification of coal and its mixture with oxygen, a much cleaner and more volatile product could be made than the natural fuel now consumed.

RESEARCH LACKING

The method of production remains to be perfected, but Otto believes it is readily feasible. This led him to criticize the lack of detailed research being done in the field of coal. He said that with the proper concentration of scientific effort, the process of conversion would probably be a present reality.

Otto believes that the undertaking should be made by the industry and that research has been lax because of the great demand for coal both as a fuel and the base product of hundreds of chemicals.

At present, much of the gas consumed in West Virginia comes over long transmission lines that lead here and to the eastern seaboard. But this State remains a major gas producer in the East. Much of the production goes out of the State.

The occasion of newsmen visiting the Belle plant was for an inspection of the modernized works.

The company last summer completed a multi-million-dollar conversion from coal use to natural gas as a basic raw material in the manufacture of chemicals.

COAL STILL USED

But E. L. (Gene) Pleninger, assistant to the manager, pointed out that Du Pont has far from completely abandoned coal at Belle. Thirty carloads are used daily in the generation of steam.

Pleninger pointed out that modernization at staggering cost became a necessity if the plant was to remain in the competitive market. Old production techniques designed more than three decades ago could not match those less cumbersome and costly in modern day plants, he said.

The plant employs 3,000 persons. Four hundred others were cut from the payroll when modernization was completed. Pleninger said this step had to be taken but was deeply regretted. Many were placed in other chemical plants through a company employment bureau.

The first nylon manufactured came from the Belle plant. The base product made there is ammonia. From it many other wonders of the chemical world are extracted.

Pleninger told newsmen that the competitive position of the Belle plant now is excellent.

WIRETAPPING, EAVESDROPPING, AND THE BILL OF RIGHTS

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, on December 15 and 16, 1959, the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights held hearings on wiretappining, eavesdropping, and the Bill of Rights.

Those hearings evoked some very thought-provoking comment because of the high caliber of the three lawyers who testified, and a demonstration of electronic eavesdropping devices by another witness, Harold Lipset, a San Francisco private investigator. The complex legal questions that have been raised by use of these devices were ably discussed by Edward Bennett Williams, of Washington, D.C., prominent defense counsel; Paul Williams, of New York City, former U.S. attorney for the southern district of New York; and Harris Steinberg, prominent defense counsel in New York City.

As chairman of the Senate Constitutional Rights Subcommittee, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, as a part of my remarks, a series of newspaper editorials, columns, and comments on the subject of our continuing study.

Among these materials are an editorial, "The 'Secret' Recorders," appearing in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch on December 30, 1959, and the text of a telegram from me about that editorial.

Incidentally, this is another occasion when I regret that printing rules do not provide a means of reproducing political cartoons in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I make this observation because there have been a number of cartoons in different newspapers recently bearing on wiretapping, eavesdropping, the right of privacy, and the Bill of Rights.

There being no objection, the matters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE RIGHT TO SNOOP

Since he is in the private-eye business which leans heavily on tapping telephone lines and planting secret microphones, it was natural enough for a San Franciscan named Harold Lipset to tell the Hennings committee that anybody who uses a telephone does so at his own risk and, in effect, that anyone who engages in conversation surrenders his right of privacy to anyone else who may manage to overhear what he says.

This probably is sound legal doctrine in any police state where big brother makes it his business to know everything lest anything endanger his boss rule. But neither the United States nor any of the sovereign States have yet gone totalitarian. They still are devoted to the notion of the Founding Fathers that a man's house is his castle and that his affairs are his own business—at least so long as no court has issued a writ for their investigation.

No private eye rings a man's doorbell and claims the right to tap his phone or to plant a recording machine. So even Mr. Lipset may have doubts about what he says. He should know that eavesdropping is a furtive, dirty business against which honorable men instinctively revolt. No doubt there is money in stealing other people's secrets—and listening to perhaps thousands of personal conversations to do so—but it is not nice money, nor is it legal money.

A NATION OF WHISPERERS?

The display of a pocket-sized recording gadget before the Hennings committee—brazenly used by a witness without the knowledge of the Senators—will be regarded favorably by those who believe that anything is fair in the catching of a crook. But it fills with consternation those who believe that a man's right to privacy extends to the words he speaks.

The unconsidered approval of wiretaps and other electronic devices of detection lies behind the bland admission of the Attorney General and J. Edgar Hoover that the FBI makes wide use of them. The officials contend this is proper so long as the evidence obtained is not introduced in court. In this they rely on a Supreme Court decision which rejected wiretap evidence.

Yet, as another committee witness pointed out, the Federal Communications Act broadly forbids the use of wiretaps by anyone "for his own benefit or for the benefit of another not entitled thereto." The only persons who seem to have any claim to wiretap information are the police in States which have sanctioned the dangerous practice. Other States protect telephone communications, and, at least by implication, they protect their citizens against all forms of electronic snooping.

If only the apprehension of criminals were involved, a Federal statute might be drafted which sanctioned the limited use of these devices in specific cases and for specific reasons. Perhaps an attempt should be made to draft such a law. But their use always will be repugnant because of the devices—unlike legal search and seizure—are a constant temptation to total eavesdropping on innocent and guilty alike, and for many a purpose other than law enforcement.

It is disturbing that the police and the FBI put so much reliance on electronics. How did they ever catch a criminal before this method was available to them? Must they, and every "private eye" and anybody else who has a few hundred dollars for one of these gadgets be free to listen where and when they will? Surely the manufacture and sale of electronic snooping devices should be strictly regulated. Or are we to become a Nation of furtive whisperers?

IN THE HOLDOVER

Solon, the great lawgiver of Athens, said a good 2,500 years ago that justice would not prevail unless "those who are not injured feel as indignant as those who are." That principle underlies the Bill of Rights and all other safeguards of our liberties. Those who made these rights a matter of law did "feel as indignant as those" who were injured. But do very many Americans today share this feeling? If they did, would civil rights be violated as often as they are?

The Hennings subcommittee has thrown further light on the widespread use of wiretaps and electronic snooping devices even by the Department of Justice itself. Would this be the case if indignation were as widespread as is such eavesdropping? An even more aggravated abuse is the arrest and illegal detention by the police of suspects. A Chicago judge is mentioned as a victim of this practice. Persons less well known are in greater peril. And even lawbreakers have a right to prompt arraignment and speedy trial.

A study of arrests and detentions made in Chicago by the American Civil Liberties Union conservatively suggests that in 1956 more than 20,000 arrests were made which involved detentions of more than 17 hours before those arrested were "booked." And the record of other cities is believed to be no better. Such cases have occurred in St. Louis. Being held so long by the police without even being allowed to use a telephone, for all practical purposes, may be as bad as being subjected to the third degree.

It is easy to imagine how the average citizen, especially if innocent, would feel if locked up for a day or longer without being able to call his family or a lawyer. Yet many suspects are treated this way, and then released with virtually no redress. Even the condemnation of the Supreme Court is of no avail except to those brought to trial.

Yet this limited rule of the Court has aroused the protest that it makes it too difficult for the police to capture criminals. That overlooks the importance to the innocent of speedy arraignment on a specific charge. And the speedy arraignment of lawbreakers should not be a handicap to efficient police and prosecutors. Holding a man behind bars until he confesses in sheer desperation is not a reassuring way of clearing up unsolved crimes. It is a threat to those who may be arrested through misadventure, a threat which should be intolerable to public opinion.

THE "SECRET" RECORDERS

While sympathetic with the Hennings subcommittee's efforts to find out why so many miniature recording devices are being bought in the Government, we think it important to keep in perspective the fact that neither possession nor use of such a device is necessarily sinister or even improper, even though the person involved should not be engaged in investigative work. Portable and battery-powered recorders are legitimately used for making observations and notes and even dictating letters on inspection or field trips and perhaps in many other situations. The reprehensible use of these devices is for recording the conversation of another without his knowledge. If innocent persons are not to be hurt, mere possession of a miniature recorder bought by the Government should not be allowed to become a "smear by association."

TEXT OF A TELEGRAM DATED JANUARY 5, 1960, FROM SENATOR THOMAS C. HENNINGS, JR., TO THE EDITOR OF THE EDITORIAL PAGE OF THE ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH WITH REFERENCE TO THE ABOVE EDITORIAL

Copies of late December issues of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch were not received in my office until late yesterday so this is the first opportunity I have had to comment on the editorial entitled "The 'Secret' Recorders," published on your editorial page Wednesday, December 30, 1959.

I appreciate the sympathy expressed with the Senate Constitutional Rights Subcommittee's efforts to find out why so many miniature recording devices are being bought in the Government and I note that the Post-Dispatch believes that use of these devices for recording the conversation of other persons without their knowledge is reprehensible.

So that there will not be any misunderstanding, perhaps I should point out that I have not—and neither has any other member of the subcommittee—drawn any conclusion to date that the mere possession of a miniature recording device is necessarily sinister or even improper. It is true that the subcommittee asked witnesses appearing in current hearings on the subject of wiretapping, eavesdropping, and the Bill of Rights for their views on a number of aspects of wiretapping and secret recording of sounds and conversations. In this connection, it has been only natural to ask questions about the possibility of outlawing the possession of specified equipment with the intent to use it for prohibited purposes. New York State presently has such a law. Whether such a proposal is constitutional, feasible, desirable, or otherwise expressive of sound public policy presents questions appropriately to be examined by the subcommittee. But I repeat that no conclusion has been reached nor implied by the subcommittee that mere possession of a small wire or tape recorder is improper or should be made illegal.

When informed, during the course of a hearing last month by the subcommittee, that the General Services Administration of the Federal Government lists a specific item on its price list for sale to Federal agencies and offices, I directed that an inquiry be made to ascertain how many of these devices had been purchased by Federal offices in recent years, by whom, and for what purposes. The specific device being discussed at that moment was the Minifon, a small concealable wire recorder manufactured in Germany, weighing only 28 ounces, capable of recording for 4 hours; it was demonstrated to the subcommittee by an investigator wearing it in an under-the-arm, under-the-coat, holster with the microphone attached to a necktie clip, or disguised as a wristwatch. My initial inquiry therefore was specifically directed to purchase and use of the Minifon although it is obvious we should ask the same questions about similar lightweight concealable, portable tape- or wire-recording equipment, and that we are doing.

Our preliminary inquiry discloses that total sales to Federal offices for the Minifon devices and accessories were as follows for the fiscal years indicated: $48,622 for fiscal year 1957; $55,244 for fiscal year 1958; and $37,270 for fiscal year 1959.

The Government price for the 4-hour recorder is listed at $269.50 and for the 2-hour recorder at $249.50. Quantity discounts apply of 2½ percent for 1 to 5, 5 percent for 6 to 10, and 10 percent on 11 or more recorders.

A preliminary report on Government agencies and offices which have purchased Minifon wire recorders in the second half of 1959 furnishes the names of the following:

Internal Revenue Service, Washington, D.C., 1; U.S. Naval Security Station, Washington, D.C., 1; National Institutes of Health, Bethesda, Md., 2; Fort Holabird, Baltimore, Md., 7; District Director, Internal Revenue Service, Cleveland, Ohio, 1; Signal Supply Officer, Decatur, Ill., 3; Veterans' Administration Hospital, Phoenix, Ariz., 1; Diamond Ordnance Fuse Laboratories, Washington, D.C., 1.

To date, we do not have an indication of the stated purposes for which these devices were purchased.

I trust that this information will be helpful to you.

Your thoughtful editorial of December 22, 1959, entitled "A Nation of Whisperers?" indicates our common concern about the use of these electronic devices. It is indeed a disturbing subject that requires all the facts and all the thought that we can muster in our respective roles as Members of Congress, law enforcement officials, commentators, and plain citizens.

The Senate Constitutional Rights Subcommittee, of which I am chairman, is interested in reaching a better understanding of the present-day use of wiretapping and electronic eavesdropping devices, by whom and for what purposes. As our study progresses, we expect to be in a much better position to determine whether we should recommend further restrictive legislation, permissive laws, or that no further statutes be enacted concerning either wiretapping or electronic listening devices and secret recording equipment.

[From the Washington Post, July 24, 1958]

PRIVATE LINE

In Coxsackie, N.Y., there is a small, independent telephone company with a general manager named James Warren who believes that a subscriber who pays for a private telephone is entitled to privacy in the use of it. This old-fashioned fastidiousness got Mr. Warren into serious trouble recently. State police investigating gambling came to him with a court wiretap order authorizing them to tap the telephone of one of Mr. Warren's subscribers. In the presence of the police, Mr. Warren notified the subscriber that his telephone was about to be tapped. So the police arrested Mr. Warren on the charge of disclosing the contents of the court order—an indictable misdemeanor, for which there is a maximum penalty of a year in jail and a $500 fine.

Without knowing whether Mr. Warren's subscriber was actually engaged in gambling and without knowing the precise terms of the law respecting wiretapping in New York (a State which permits interception of telephone conversations despite an act of Congress forbidding such interception), we offer a silent cheer for Mr. Warren. He told reporters that he considers wiretapping an unwarranted invasion of an individual's privacy and added that it is high time somebody had the courage to stand up against such an invasion of privacy. We think so, too. Mr. Warren's attitude, peculiarly appropriate to an official of a public utility engaged in the business of facilitating communication between individuals, is a thoroughly becoming one to any freeborn American.

FORCES MOBILIZE FOR INVASION OF OUR PRIVACY

(By George Dixon)

Without a formal declaration of war, we are preparing for one of the most devastating invasions in history—the invasion of privacy. We are mobilizing forces to invade our lives and put to rout our innermost secrets.

On Capitol Hill the Senators are studying eavesdropping equipment that is well-nigh undetectable. In a building in downtown Washington the International Association of Chiefs of Police is plotting a campaign to spy secretly upon motorists. And at Forbes Air Force Base, in Topeka, Kans., they have started, and then hastily dropped, an around-the-clock check on the airmen, including what they do off duty and with whom.

When I dropped in on the Senate Constitutional Rights Subcommittee the solons were watching a demonstration of eavesdropping gadgets by a San Francisco private eye named Harold K. Lipset. Looking as nervous as if he expected the coppers from San Francisco Beat to muscle in on him any minute, Shamus Lipset first showed pocket-sized devices that can be hidden in anybody's living room, bedroom, or bath, and which start working automatically at the sound of a voice.

One of these instruments would have to work long hours if planted in the Dixons' love nest. The private dick said it would operate 24 hours a day for 5 days without running down, which isn't any more than I can do. Moreover, I, too, start working automatically at the sound of a voice—and you can guess whose.

Subcommittee Chairman THOMAS C. HENNINGS, JR., Democrat, of Missouri, didn't exactly tell Private Eye Lipset: "I'm from Missouri. You've got to show me," but he inquired if the pocket recorder operated noiselessly. The "eye" replied that it was operating right under Senator HENNINGS' nose, picking up everything he said, and recording it.

The private investigator then pulled off his coat and revealed a recorder strapped under his armpit, the way his TV counterparts pack a rod. Lipset explained it was handy for taking down open air conversations.

A recorder like that could be more deadly than a gun. A gun-toter is not apt to shoot you on the chance that you will talk out of turn but a spy with one of those things aimed at you could make you wish for the mercy of a bullet.

The secret spying on motorists by the chiefs of police was disclosed by the association's field service director, Ray Ashworth, who said the U.S. Public Health Service granted $209,515 for the snooping. He said concealed devices and aerial photos will be employed to study the driving habits of autoists who won't know they are under observation.

Ashworth explained that drivers will behave more naturally if they don't know they're being watched, and it'll be easier to detect the vagaries that go to make accidents. As well as being unconscionable invasion of privacy this could be almost murderously dangerous. I shudder to think of one lovely lady with whom I am closely associated behaving any more naturally at the wheel of a car than she does when she thinks the cops are looking.

DIRTY BUSINESS

The witnesses who appeared last week before Senator HENNINGS' Constitutional Rights Subcommittee were virtually unanimous in the view that wiretapping is, as Mr. Justice Holmes said long ago, dirty business. Not all of them agreed, however, with an assertion by the same Justice in the same opinion that "it is a less evil that some criminals should escape than that the Government should play an ignoble part." For example, Paul Williams, a former U.S. attorney in New York, told the subcommittee that, although wiretapping is dirty business, crime is even dirtier; and he went on to declare: "Wiretapping is so important that New York wouldn't be a livable place without it."

Mr. Williams invites the question whether New York is a livable place with wiretapping. The State permits its police to tap telephones with a court order. According to a study just published under the sponsorship of the Pennsylvania Bar Association Endowment, "most of the private wiretapping done in the world is done in the city of New York," and the New York City police make approximately 20,000 wire taps a year, all but a small number of which are illegal in the sense that they are set up by plainclothes policemen without any prior court authorization. This hardly makes for an atmosphere of free and comfortable communication.

Wiretapping is not only dirty; it is also unlawful. This was made abundantly clear by another Mr. Williams who appeared before the subcommittee—Edward Bennett Williams, an eminent attorney. Section 605 of the Federal Communications Act says very explicitly:

"No person not being authorized by the sender shall intercept and divulge or publish the existence, contents, substance, purport, effect, or meaning of such intercepted communication to any person * * * or use the same or any information therein contained for his own benefit or for the benefit of another not entitled thereto."

Successive Attorneys General have argued that this section makes wiretapping a crime only if its fruits are published or divulged; and this, of course, is one reason why evidence obtained by wiretapping is not admissible in any Federal court. But the section also forbids any use of information obtained by a wiretapper for his own benefit or for the benefit of another. To tape wires without making any use whatever of what the wiretap discloses would be altogether senseless.

It is unmistakably plain from this that whenever any information is used as the product of a wiretap, in New York or anywhere else in the United States whether with a court order or without, an act of Congress is violated. It is no less plain that this act of Congress is violated even when the tapping is done by the FBI, whose director candidly acknowledges that it taps telephones in cases involving national security. The law prohibits any use for any purpose.

Wiretapping, as Edward Bennett Williams put it, is rampant in this country today. And the reason it is rampant, he pointed out, is that law enforcement agencies cannot effectively enforce a law which they themselves violate. The Department of Justice has repeatedly asked Congress to change the law; Congress has repeatedly failed to do so. Another subcommittee witness, Harris Steinberg, said forcefully that the use of "lawless methods degrades the Government which uses them." Law observance is the first obligation of those who enforce the law.

[From the Washington Star, Dec. 18, 1959]

NOT SO "DIRTY" AS IT SEEMS

The Senate Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights heard witnesses repeat the late Justice Holmes' comment that wiretapping is a "dirty business." But one of the witnesses, former U.S. Attorney Paul Williams, properly pointed out that "crime is even dirtier." Some crimes against the Federal or State government are so dirty, he said, that eavesdropping by law enforcement authorities is fully justified. We agree.

Is listening in on a suspected spy's telephone line so unethical that the FBI should allow itself to hear no evil unless the plotters are warned first that their line has been tapped?

Is wiretapping such an underhanded way of trapping a kidnaper that he should be permitted free use of his telephone to make his ransom demands on the parents of an abducted—and possibly slain—child?

How much courtesy and consideration should law enforcement officers be required to display toward a vicious criminal?

We strongly endorse Mr. Williams' recommendation that wiretapping be legalized by specific Federal legislation and that use of wiretap evidence in kidnaping and national security cases be permitted by law in Federal courts. The whole not-so-dirty business should be surrounded with careful safeguards against abuses, however, with the authority for specific taps vested in responsible officials—such as the Attorney General or the judges of Federal or State courts.

[From the Washington (D.C.) Labor, Jan. 31, 1959]

CONGRESS SHOULD END THIS "DIRTY BUSINESS"

Labor often has reported on the growth of two kinds of modern scientific snooping—wiretapping and eavesdropping—which a great Supreme Court Justice, Louis Brandeis, once called a dirty business. Now a particularly noteworthy article on that subject has been written by Bem Price, Washington correspondent of the Associated Press, and carried in various papers across the country.

"Here (in Washington) you have the uneasy feeling that half the people in town are listening to the other half. The feeling is justified, in large part.

"Washington, headquarters for more than 25,000 Government-paid investigators, has become a city infested with snoopers, wiretappers, and eavesdroppers."

The article explains that, in wiretapping, an actual connection is made with a telephone wire, so that a snooper can listen in, and this is supposed to be illegal. On the other hand, there is no law against eavesdropping, which is listening in on conversations by means of modern electronic devices, without any connection with telephone wires.

"Loyalty probes, security checks, and assorted congressional and department investigations," the article says, "apparently have shredded what most citizens regard as their right to privacy. Private detectives are in the act, too. Wiretapping is not confined to Washington, but few cities offer so lush a field for the electronic snooper—and so many rewards."

The Senate Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights, headed by Senator THOMAS C. HENNINGS, Democrat, of Missouri, will soon resume its hearings on this subject, Price points out. Then he says:

"Meanwhile, the wise man here in Washington, especially if he is of some importance in public life, keeps in mind the possibility that even the walls have ears. He knows there are radio transmitters and tape recorders which can be carried in innocent-looking briefcases, mounted behind pictures, installed in lamps or in desks, or carried in shoulder holsters. Above all, he is careful when he discusses business on the telephone.

"A lot of business firms are using private detectives skilled in bugging for industrial espionage. A police captain advised: 'If you want a private conversation with a guy, take him to a turkish bath—and don't go there too often.'

"Who taps wires? Who eavesdrops?" the article asks, and answers: "More than 40 public investigative agencies in Washington and its environs.

"In addition to the regular police forces, there are investigators for Congress, the FBI, the Secret Service, the Civil Service, the Central Intelligence Agency, the Bureau of Internal Revenue, the Post Office, all three armed services, and each major branch of the Government. There are 31 private detective agencies."

After telling much more about this modern snooping, the article adds: "All this poses a fundamental question for Americans: At what point does wiretapping and eavesdropping begin to approximate police intimidation and political thought control?"

Similarly, Senator WAYNE MORSE, Democrat, of Oregon, has warned that the rising wave of snooping may be a sign that this country is in danger of becoming a police state. Senator HENNINGS feels much the same way about it, and some further light on the subject will be provided by his committee's hearings.

As Labor has pointed out before, such an inquiry is vitally needed—and so is action to curb this dirty business.

EAVESDROPPING ISSUE DRAWS LITTLE INTEREST

(By Frederic W. Collins)

WASHINGTON.—About the only change that seems to have occurred in the eavesdropping business in 20 years has been in the field of technical improvement.

Senator THOMAS C. HENNINGS, Jr., Democrat, of Missouri, chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights, has been holding hearings this week on wiretapping, eavesdropping, and the Bill of Rights.

Constitutional rights apparently rank somewhere below cranberries, payola, broadcast programs, and the high prices for drugs as a subject of public concern. Senator HENNINGS, one colleague, one staff attorney, and a handful of spectators and reporters are rattling around in the huge Senate caucus room.

The chummy discussions between Senator HENNINGS and his witnesses could as easily, by all signs, be carried on across a luncheon table. But several linear feet of distance and several square yards of mahogany committee table destroy the intimacy of their communication and reduce it to lonely echoes in the almost empty marble chamber.

It was just about 20 years ago that a wiretap case steeped in politics had Rhode Island by the ear. It is just about 19½ years since another Senate subcommittee looked into that case and the general subject of eavesdropping.

The operation at issue then involved climbing a pole with a roll of wire and connecting the right "pairs" to a listening device. Now, as Senator HENNINGS was told, listening in can be done without any direct connection.

Paul W. Williams, a former U.S. district attorney in New York, explained listening by "the induction method—you just lay a wire down beside the telephone line and you can hear the conversation.

"Or," he said, "You don't even have to be in the same room. You can hang a device on a wall in the next room. Or," he said, "the old-fashioned direct connection can be used."

Earlier witnesses showed pocket-sized devices, easy to conceal in a room, which would start recording at the sound of a voice. One transmitter would run for 5 days, 24 hours a day, before its batteries run down. A recording device worn unnoticeably in a holster under a suit coat was displayed.

Against these modern marvels, the issues stood unchanged. There were still the frequent references to the characterization of wiretapping as "a dirty business" by the late Justice Holmes. There are the arguments by prosecutors, like Mr. Williams, that law enforcement requires wiretapping—under appropriate safeguards, of course. And there are counterarguments in favor of defending individuals against invasion of their privacy, by denying officials any more leeway than they have now.

Senator HENNINGS is regarded as being just about as sincere in his dedication to the protection of individual rights as any Member of the Senate. A former prosecutor, greatly respected as a constitutional lawyer, he remarked rather wearily to Mr. Williams yesterday:

"Government officials are violating the law now. We have evidence. You'd like to have them do it legally."

But he is conscientiously steering clear of conclusions. He recognizes three schools of thought: Those who think wiretapping and eavesdropping should be banned completely as destructive of private freedom; those who would authorize law enforcement officers to use the latest devices in coping with crime, and use the results in prosecution; and those who favor strictly private use of such devices, totally unrelated to crime.

He sees little ground for compromise among those views. Perhaps his own was disclosed when he remarked at the opening session on Tuesday that the day marked the 168th anniversary of the adoption of the Bill of Rights.

CONFIDENTIAL

The vexed question of wiretapping and other electronic spying has been getting another going over, this time by Senator HENNINGS's subcommittee. All agree that wiretapping is, in the late Justice Holmes's words, "a dirty business." From that follows the argument about whether ends justify the means, proper legal control of their use, and so forth.

One question that gets little attention, however, is whether the best laws and regulations imaginable can really control wiretapping and the use of the results so obtained. Laws and regulations are far from foolproof, in spite of the widely held belief in this country that all you have to do to correct or prevent an evil is to pass a law.

We cite an example—namely, the unauthorized use of wiretapping information in that kangaroo court set up last spring by members of the city delegation at Annapolis to get Police Commissioner Hepbron.

General Order No. 8533 of the police department, governing the use of wiretap information, runs to four pages and reads like a model document. It includes the following:

"3(b) All requests or suggestions for interception of communications, all applications to a court, all court orders, all tapes and recordings, all reports, and all other records, writings, or information concerning interception of communications shall be considered strictly confidential by every member of this Department and all knowledge or information relating thereto shall be restricted to those persons authorized by law and this order on a 'need-to-know' basis. All matters relating to interception of communications shall be conducted in such a manner and with such precautions as to insure this confidential treatment."

Yet most of the testimony in that hearing was based on wiretap information which former Chief Inspector Ford (who retired so abruptly in December 1957) had taken from police department files before retiring. There is no evidence that he had formal authorization to do this. Even if he had, there was no authority to divulge this information in an informal, open hearing of this kind.

Maryland wiretap law reads well. General Order No. 8533 reads well. Their power to restrain proved in this case to be precisely nil. Nor have we seen any disposition anywhere to follow up this disregard of law and regulation.

ASSIGNMENT: WASHINGTON

(By Ed Koterba)

WASHINGTON, December 20.—It was with sagging relief that I walked into the old stomping grounds of our Senate caucus room, the place where everybody practices the art of free expression.

Reason for this sense of utter mental relaxation was that now, at last, I had freedom to talk without the overbearing fear of being bugged by hidden microphones.

In Czechoslovakia, I had good reason to suspect that the Commies went so far as to slip a miniature wire recorder into the lining of my overcoat while I slept at night, to record my next day's activities.

But, now, this was America. This was the Senate caucus room. And the first thing I discovered was that the place was bugged.

A wire recorder was spinning away secretly even while a Senator was wondering out loud how those gadgets work. Senator THOMAS C. HENNINGS, Jr., Democrat, of Missouri, had called together his constitutional rights subcommittee to look into the constitutionality of mechanical snooping.

One witness was Harold Lipset, a private investigator from San Francisco. When he started to explain to the subcommittee how simple it was to tap public and private sound waves, the man from Missouri wanted to be shown. So the investigator showed him.

He peeled off his coal and right there under his armpit, like a .45 in a holster, was a miniature recorder that no one knew was there. Another recorder, placed discretely 40 feet away, was taking down the dialogue without the use of wires or hands, and without a peep.

I recall last year, at a New York convention, a sound salesman tried to sell me a $500 outfit that could pick up whispers on the run from 100 feet away.

Now, some of those sensitive little snakes in the grass cost around $300, but with heavy production the price could drop to a fraction of that.

The caucus room demonstration left me almost speechless. And that's why I'm going to stay if Congress doesn't outlaw those miniature monsters.

Can you imagine what would happen to this country if those recorders got as popular as TV sets and everybody owned one? For one thing, it would destroy the exciting pastime of gossip. We'd have a million noiseless spies in our midst.

You can see what would happen to Gussie the Gossip. In the middle of the night, her phone would ring. The voice on the other end would say: "Gussie, I have just played back my recorder, and I resent what you said about me at the party last night when I left the bridge table to go to the powder room."

And Gussie would retort: "Well, I don't recall what I said because I had my recorder beamed at the next table, and from the playback I just learned what the girls picked up from you when you were saying those nasty things about me in the powder room."

Unless Congress passes some laws, our only escape to privacy will be to the cellar.

DANGEROUS HABITS—BETTER STOP 'EM

In case you are going to stop eating, why not stop talking, too? As you know from recent news reports, both practices are dangerous.

If you eat you might get a chemical poison (cancer possibilities), as the pronouncements have shown. If you talk you might get blackmailed, as a Senate Constitutional Rights Committee disclosure has indicated.

It probably will be consoling to some people to know that some slight precautions can be taken against having private conversations recorded and used for blackmail or other purposes. But even this uncertain safety is reserved for alert people who look into the old cigarette cases around the desk for midget voice recorders, and keep an eye on that thing on the other fellow's wrist that passes as a watch.

A private detective demonstrated one of the midget electronic devices to Senator TOM HENNINGS in committee. The Senator caught the significance of it instanter, and hurried investigators out to find "if those worthies down Constitution Avenue" (bureaucrats) were using them to eavesdrop on unsuspecting people.

The Senator could be optimistic about the chances of finding a culprit because the things cost about $300 now, and the Government records would show if any were bought. But the solon's good luck, if he has any, won't mean a thing to Smith or Jones who thinks he can have a little head-to-head talk with a fellow he has seen around a good deal. Prices will come down—for the used kinds, anyhow—and the time may come when no good eavesdropper would be caught without a gadget.

So you see, if you want to play it really safe (100 percent social security), you'll have to quit doing the things that are dangerous to you. Don't eat; don't speak.

WIRETAPPING IN THE UNITED KINGDOM

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, the question of wiretapping of private telephone lines has lately become a subject of considerable interest in the United Kingdom. Sharp debate in the House of Commons has led to the appointment of a Committee of Privy Councillors to study what to do about evidence collected by police wiretaps. I feel that it would be enlightening to include in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD two news reports on the controversy; an excerpt from an editorial appearing in the London Times of December 7, 1959, and, finally, a portion of the debate in the House of Commons on December 16, 1959, which states the problem and which became so intense that one Member of Parliament arose and observed: "Really. This debate is becoming like a beer garden."

Therefore, I ask unanimous consent to have various items printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the items were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington (D.C.) Evening Star, Dec. 17, 1959]

LABORITES LOSE WIRETAP DEBATE

LONDON, December 17.—The government last night defeated a censure motion in the House of Commons after a sharp debate on police tapping of private phone lines. The vote was 336–238.

Home Secretary Richard A. Butler declared there is no widespread wiretapping. At the same time he said he is setting up a committee to consider whether evidence collected by this means should be handed over to professional disciplinary bodies.

Wiretapping became a national controversy recently after disclosure that a police tap led to the barring of a physician from practicing his profession. The General Medical Council struck him off its register for infamous conduct after police were directed to produce a record of a phone call between the doctor and a woman patient. The police had tapped the phone at the woman's request.

The censure motion, filed by Laborite Patrick Gordon Walker, regretted Mr. Butler's failure to insure that no telephone conversation would be intercepted without his express permission.

[From the Christian Science Monitor, Dec. 17, 1959]

BRITAIN TO INVESTIGATE PHONE TAPPING

(By Peter Lyne)

LONDON.—Following a rumpus in Westminster over phone tapping by the police, the Macmillan government will set up a committee of inquiry to investigate telephone interception by the police and the use made of information thus obtained.

Home Secretary Richard A. Butler gave this news to the Commons on the night of December 16 after the Labor opposition had moved a motion of censure on the Government arising out of the case of Dr. Kenneth Fox. Dr. Fox was disqualified from practicing by the General Medical Council largely on evidence obtained by police phone tapping.

The police had acted on a deputy coroner's request because the suicide of a woman was involved in the case.

Mr. Butler's case has been that with the subscriber's consent the police listened on a private telephone extension in the course of criminal investigation.

Mr. Butler explained that the solicitor to the General Medical Council learned from the subscriber that a record of the conversation had been made and subpenaed the police to produce it.

According to the Home Secretary, when the subpena was received he was consulted on whether the subpena should be complied with. He accepted the advice given to him that it should.

In other words, Mr. Butler refused to intervene. And this was largely the basis of the Labor charge against him.

OPPOSITION STATED

In the Commons debate on the night of December 16, Labor spokesman, Patrick Gordon Walker, protested that it was not just a case of the police listening in.

Mr. Gordon Walker told the Commons, "The police first of all instigate a conversation, then they deliberately and secretly listen to it and record it.

"They record the words of a man who knew nothing about it in order to incriminate him.

"Unless we stoutly announce and confirm that every citizen must have an assurance that this sort of thing does not happen without the Home Secretary's warrant, then our liberty is threatened."

Mr. Gordon Walker continued: "Every citizen who uses any means of communication provided by the state should have an absolute assurance that his communications, his talk, or letters should not be intercepted by the agents of the state without a warrant."

WARRANT NOT NEEDED?

According to Mr. Gordon Walker it had been generally assumed that the Home Secretary's warrant was necessary for every phone interception. But now it appeared that any policeman could intercept any conversation at his own discretion and without a warrant.

Mr. Gordon Walker said he thought the Home Secretary was wrong in not applying for Crown privilege to prevent the police from handing over the transcript of the phone conversation to the General Medical Council.

MOTION DEFEATED

Mr. Butler sharply protested against what Mr. Gordon Walker was implying. He said this method of investigation was very sparingly used. But he announced the setting up of the committee of inquiry.

The Commons defeated the opposition's censure motion by 336 votes to 238.

Earlier, Prime Minister Harold Macmillan announced another and must wider inquiry. A royal commission will review the constitutional position of the police, and in particular their relationship with the public.

The chairman is to be Sir Henry Willink, eminent lawyer and master of Magdalene College, Cambridge.

There is welcome from all sides of the Commons for this move, because in many respects relations between police and public seem to have deteriorated lately in Britain.

Police pay will also be reviewed. An inadequate wage standard is considered one of the reasons London's police force is undermanned at the moment.

EXCERPT FROM THE TIMES, LONDON, DECEMBER 7, 1959

Eavesdropping is distasteful and more is needed than emerged on Wednesday to satisfy people that this commonplace device of police states will be used in our free society only for compelling reasons affecting the course of justice at its gravest and, then, with the prior consent of high authority.

When so used its results should be firmly put out of reach of even so responsible and essential a body as the General Medical Council. The council performs, of course, disciplinary functions of the highest social value. But it does not constitute a court of law, and to supply it with evidence furtively collected for the purposes of justice and, in that context, available only under the known safeguards of our legal system is surely indefensible. There is something peculiarly repugnant about words taken down, unknown to their speaker, by a police recording instrument, being used for a quite different purpose, where no breach of the law is involved.

EXCERPTS FROM PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES, HOUSE OF COMMONS, DECEMBER 16, 1959

TELEPHONE TAPPING

Mr. GORDON WALKER (Smethwick). I beg to move that this House regrets the failure of the Secretary of State for the Home Department to insure that no telephone conversations should be intercepted without his express warrant and that material obtained by interception should in no circumstances be made available to any body or person whatever outside the public service; and calls upon Her Majesty's government to carry into effect their acceptance of the recommendations in the report of the Committee on Privy Councillors appointed to inquire into the interception of communications, presented to Parliament on November 28, 1957, Command Paper No. 283.

This motion raises two distinct but related issues. The first concerns the interception of a telephone conversation without the warrant of the Secretary of State, and the second issue goes to the disclosure of material obtained by interception outside the public service to a domestic tribunal. Both of these are of the highest importance for the liberty of the subject. Both are attended by some difficulties. But, in both these aspects of the problem, as it seems to us, the Secretary of State has acted in breach of the acceptance by the Prime Minister on October 3, 1957, of the Birkett Committee Report.

I should like to take the two issues, related as they are, separately and in turn and to start with the question of interception. The right honorable gentleman argued—this argument has been taken up by a number of newspapers—that, in this case the listening in was done with the consent of one party, and was done on an extension, it really is nothing more than a case of eavesdropping, no different in essence from a policeman hiding behind a curtain to catch a blackmailer. Therefore, it is argued that the police must have this sort of power in order to make effective criminal inquiries.

I wish to make one thing clear straight away. The argument between us here is not about whether or not the police should have the sort of power they used in this case. We are saying they should not use the power off their own bat, that they should have applied for a warrant to the Secretary of State. The right honorable gentleman then would have had to decide whether this was a proper case for the application for a warrant, whether it fell within the sphere of crimes and types of offenses for which interception is permissible. To say that a warrant is necessary in this case is no more to deprive the police of the power to intercept than saying that a search warrant is necessary deprives the police of the power to search.

Those who argue—this has been argued in many quarters, including some liberal-minded newspapers—that this is only a case of legitimate eavesdropping seem to me to be on a rather dangerous and slippery slope. The line running from eavesdropping all the way to telephone tapping is a line made up of a series of gradations, and it is not at all easy to draw a logical line of distinction. After all, telephone tapping itself is only a form of eavesdropping, and one must be very careful how far one carries this eavesdropping argument. One can only distinguish between eavesdropping on the one hand and telephone tapping on the other because one draws an arbitrary line—not one which can be wholly defended in logic—which is absolutely necessary to the securing of our liberties. Just because it is not easy to draw a clear and logical line, it is absolutely essential to draw a clear and firm line in these matters and to draw it decisively on the side of liberty.

I have given a great deal of thought to these difficult questions, both as a member of the Birkett committee and in this matter, as soon as the facts which we are now discussing first became known to us. It seems to me that the point at which we must draw a clear line, even though it be a little arbitrary, if our liberties are not to slip and slide from us, is, first, at the point where the police come in, and second, where a telephone is concerned. It seems to me that one must cling to those two points or one is in grave danger of being led into very perilous paths, as I think the facts of this case show.

It was not—as the right honorable gentleman kept on implying when answering questions on December 3—just somebody listening in on an extension. It was the police listening in. Now let us consider what the police did without a warrant authorizing them to do it. They first of all instigated a conversation and then they deliberately and secretly listened to that conversation and recorded it. They recorded the words of a man, who knew nothing about what was happening, with the aim of incriminating him. And all that was done without a warrant. I say that our liberties are really in danger unless we stoutly announce and affirm that every citizen in this country must have the absolute assurance that this sort of thing does not happen, that this sort of action is not done to him by the police without the warrant of the Secretary of State. I think that equally we get into danger unless we draw a line, and a firm line, between eavesdropping at large and eavesdropping on the telephone.

FEDERAL ELECTIONS ACT OF 1959

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BUTLER in the chair). Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed.

The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business which will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (S. 2436) to revise the Federal election laws, to prevent corrupt practices in Federal elections, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS], on behalf of himself and the Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING].

REVISION OF CONNALLY AMENDMENT: A DUTY THE SENATE MUST NOT SHIRK

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, comments on the cold-war struggle are most frequently expressed in terms of comparisons between military capability, economic development, and propaganda effectiveness. These are, indeed, the vital weapons of the cold war, and they deserve critical analysis. They are not, however, the objectives of this unprecedented conflict.

The world situation does require that we maintain a defense force second to none, that we preserve a healthy and vigorous economy, and that we refute the lies and distortions of the international Communist conspiracy. But these are only the methods of struggle, not its goals. I believe that there has been too little discussion of the American mission in the cold war and too much confusion between means and ends.

One reason for this confusion is that it is much easier to debate tactics than it is to define strategy. The armchair generals have had a field day on such subjects as the missile gap, the merits of one rocket over another, the need for more nuclear submarines or more aircraft carriers. The economists can supply us with daily tomes on gross national products, production techniques, and standards of living. I do not want to undermine the importance of these subjects, but I do want to emphasize my belief that in America the discussion of principles should get at least as much attention as the discussion of statistics.

I want to discuss today one of these much-neglected principles in the hope that my remarks will center attention on an important goal of America's cold-war efforts; namely, advancement of the rule of law in the settlement of international disputes.

This goal is uniquely related to our American heritage. Our land was settled by people escaping tyranny. Our Government was established and nurtured by men dedicated to freedom and justice. While we have not yet achieved equal justice for all our citizens, we have made constant progress. In our Nation there is a passion for justice and a feeling almost of reverence toward the law.

Communism, on the other hand, is a materialistic and expedient system. Its theology is the philosophy of Marx and Engels. Its god, whatever dictator holds sway. Communists regard our laws as a bourgeois invention and their own as simply another means of consolidating the power of the ruling clique. Justice in the Communist block is what the dictator decrees. Theirs is a government by force, not of law.

We Americans are proud of our heritage. But pride is not enough. I believe we have a duty to future generations of the world to preserve and foster the rule of law. This is a sacred mission stemming from our inheritance of the blessings of freedom and justice. Let it be recorded in the history of freedom that America met its duty.

This, then, is one of the reasons why we have engaged Russia in a cold war. This ideal of a rule of law gives an almost spiritual purpose to our struggle. For the law, after all, protects our religious worship, as one of our inalienable rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. If Russia and its ally, Red China, were ever victorious in the cold war, one of their first measures would be to destroy the rule of law. Is any sacrifice too great to prevent such a calamity?

The Senate of the United States can demonstrate its faith in the rule of law by strengthening the International Court of Justice. This tribunal was created by the United Nations especially to apply the rule of law to the settlement of international disputes. In keeping with our traditions, the United States should be one of its stanchest supporters.

The fact is that the United States has done less than many other nations to encourage the use of the International Court of Justice. One of the major failings of our policy in this regard has been the assertion of a unilateral right to divest the Court of jurisdiction. Under the United Nation's Charter, the International Court of Justice may not assert jurisdiction over matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any state. Faith in the Court would require us to assume that this limitation would be respected. But every judicial body should have the authority to determine its own jurisdiction when its power is challenged. What the United States has done with respect to the International Court of Justice is to assert the right in cases in which it may be a litigant to determine the Court's jurisdiction for itself. This shows a lack of confidence in the judicial process which is wholly inconsistent with our dedication to a rule of law. As was said in an editorial in the New York Times:

> A court whose jurisdiction depends on the whim of the defendant cannot add much to the law.

This U.S. reservation is contained in the Declaration of Adherence filed under article 36 of the statute of the International Court of Justice. This reservation, the last eight words of which are referred to as the Connally amendment, provides that the Declaration of Adherence shall not apply to—> disputes with regard to matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of the United States of America as determined by the United States of America.

In effect, this gives the United States a veto power with respect to the jurisdiction of the Court.

This veto power can operate to our disadvantage in a number of ways.

First of all, under article 36 of the statute of the International Court of Justice, any nation has the right to invoke against the United States the veto power we have reserved. This is because the statute provides that the obligations assumed by any nation thereunder shall exist only in "relation to any other state accepting the same obligation." The United States' assertion of the right to be judge in its own case, therefore, has given other member states a reciprocal right in any case to which the United States is a party.

This reciprocity actually may hurt our intersts more than the reservation can help them. The report of the American Bar Association's Section of International and Comparative Law points out that:

> This [reservation] cripples the United States more than others because its foreign interests are the largest. From a strictly selfish, economic point of view, the United States should be doing all it can to strengthen international law and to advance, not discourage, means of enforcing international obligations.

In short, since we can reasonably expect to be plaintiff more often than defendant in cases before the International Court of Justice, we will be victim more often than beneficiary of the veto power.

This is well illustrated by an actual case cited in one of Roscoe Drummond's columns last year. In that case, the United States attempted to hale the Soviet Union before the International Court of Justice for damages caused by shooting down an unarmed American plane over the Sea of Japan. As Drummond explains, "Moscow blandly denied the Court's jurisdiction on the ground that it was a 'domestic matter.' The Court had to agree on the premise that so long as the United States reserved to itself the right to decide when an issue was 'domestic,' the right must be conceded to all other countries."

The U.S. reservation has been expressly followed by seven other member nations: France and Mexico in 1957, Liberia in 1952, Union of South Africa in 1955, India in 1956, Pakistan in 1957, and the Sudan in 1957. However, France withdrew its reservation after the Norwegian loans case in which Norway, which had no such reservation, was allowed to invoke the French reservation on the grounds of reciprocity and thereby defeat the French claim.

In addition, a number of other countries have adopted variants of the self-judging reservation. For example, in 1957, the United Kingdom filed a declaration which excluded from the Court's jurisdiction "disputes relating to any question which, in the opinion of the Government of the United Kingdom, affects the national security of the United Kingdom or any of its dependent territories." This reservation was amended in 1958 so that it is now applicable only to disputes based on events occurring prior to 1958.

It is easy to see that the precedent setting U.S. action has seriously impaired the work of the International Court. The result is that in its 14 years of existence, the 15 judges of the Court, each of whom receives a salary of $20,000 a year, have rendered decisions in only 17 contentious cases and rendered only 10 advisory opinions. This is an average of only two opinions a year, despite the obvious superabundance of international disputes during this period.

More important than this waste of manpower, however, is the demoralizing impact on the Court of these reservations. This is reason enough for a drastic modification of the present U.S. attitude toward the Court. We will never be able to convince other nations of our faith in the rule of law if we do not fully support the principal legal organ of the United Nations.

Those who continue to favor the retention of a veto power by the United States argue that this is the only way to keep the Court out of our domestic affairs. I do not advocate any cession of domestic jurisdiction to the World Court. I feel as strongly about this subject as anyone who expresses such concern. But I suspect that many misgivings on this issue are based on a failure to appreciate the numerous other limitations on the Court's intrusion into domestic affairs, all of which would remain even if the veto power were removed.

The most important of these is the provision in the United Nations Charter declaring that nothing therein:

> shall authorize the United Nations to intervene in matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any state or shall require the members to submit such matters to settlement under the present charter.

Another unmistakable limitation is the language in the remainder of the U.S. declaration stating that the declaration shall not apply to "disputes with regard to matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of the United States of America.

Beyond these broad provisions are the additional limitations spelled out in article 36 of the World Court's statute.. These specify that the Court's jurisdiction shall apply only to "legal disputes" concerning "treaties," "any question of international law," "a breach of an international obligation" and "the nature or extent of the reparation to be made for the breach of an international obligation." The American Bar Association report to which I have already referred, explains, that:

> Since the Court's "compulsory" jurisdiction is limited to international "legal" disputes, no reservation is necessary to avoid consideration by the Court of political or sociological disputes. The Declaration of Human Rights, for example, is only a "declaration" of aspirations, not a treaty. Since it created no obligations, and made no law, it could not be a proper basis for a claim before the Court. Nor could the U.S. Constitution or its laws be the basis for such a claim because they create no international law or obligations.

There can be added to these safety factors against interference in domestic matters, the right of the United States to terminate or amend any revised Declaration on 6 months' notice, and the right as a permanent member of the Security Council to veto any attempts to enforce an unwarranted judgment against the United States.

This margin of safety against misguided decisions by the World Court is more than adequate to reasonably protect our interests.

Actually, in order to secure the necessary two-thirds support for a resolution removing our veto power, it may be necessary to include in any revised declaration filed by the United States a specification of matters which we consider to be within our domestic jurisdiction. The three particular matters which immediately come to mind are immigration, tariffs, and the Panama Canal. There may well be others as to which it will be prudent to state that they are deemed by the United States to be within our domestic jurisdiction and therefore not subject to the jurisdiction of the Court. It should be made clear, of course, that the three matters I have mentioned are not the only subjects of domestic jurisdiction, and if necessary, the list could be supplemented from time to time.

Such a revised declaration would remove the most obnoxious feature of our present declaration—its self-judging language. While it would not go as far as some have proposed, it would be an unmistakable forward step in our efforts to promote an international rule of law.

I would expect that such a precedent would be followed by the other nations of the world who have also pledged their support to the International Court of Justice.

As I indicated at the beginning of my remarks, I believe that it is of supreme importance that we define our objectives in the cold war struggle. I hope that in the rush to get through the session we will not overlook this vitually significant matter. It has been urged by the President, the Vice President, and the Attorney General. Let us do our part in President Eisenhower's crusade for peace with freedom by expressing our full faith in the instruments of international justice.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. RANDOLPH in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

INCOME-TAX CREDIT FOR CONTRIBUTIONS TO A NATIONAL OR STATE POLITICAL PARTY

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, on Wednesday the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK] and I announced our intention to introduce an amendment to S. 2436 to permit an individual over 18 years of age to receive a credit against his personal income tax of an amount, up to a maximum of $10, equal to any contributions of money made by the individual to a National or State political party.

In view of the fact that an amendment providing for a tax credit was placed before the Senate late Wednesday afternoon by the capable Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER], rather than submit to the Senate a second and similar amendment, we have decided to withhold introduction of our proposal.

It is my understanding that the Senator from Tennessee intends to call up his amendment today, or tomorrow, if debate should continue that long. I welcome the fact that the Senate will have an opportunity to vote on the issue of Government encouragement of small campaign contributions through the machinery of a tax credit against Federal personal income-tax liability, a suggestion which I advanced in 1956, and which I believe would be a significant aid in eliminating the necessity for large campaign contributions, with their accompanying danger to true democracy, and in stimulating public participation in the political process.

THE STEEL STRIKE SETTLEMENT

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, on Monday, January 11, in discussing the recent political settlement of the steel strike, I referred to "the $1 billion estimated cost of the settlement" which I said surely would be paid by the general public in the form of increased prices throughout the economy, with something extra added for the steel companies.

I should have made it clear that the $1 billion increase was the estimate of Mr. Roger M. Blough of United States Steel as to the cost of the increase to the steel companies only and was confined to the 30-month period of the contract.

If I left the impression that this $1 billion was in any sense a total price tag on the political settlement of the strike, I wish to apologize to any reader of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD who may have been misled thereby.

The total bill which this political settlement will involve is incalculable. As an example of what the political settlement is already entailing, I wish to refer to the Wall Street Journal of January 11 containing a page 1 article headed "Steel Pact Triggers Factory Price Boosts; Retailers Set To Follow."

I read only the first sentence:

> CHICAGO.—"Two weeks ago, I was considering raising prices a little in March or April, but since the steel settlement I've decided to increase them at least 3 percent and do it as soon as possible." Speaking is Morris Futorian, president of Futorian-Stratford Furniture Co.

This article gives a number of examples of what is already occurring throughout the economy in increased prices resulting, directly and indirectly, from the steel strike, even before the political strike settlement is effective in increased costs to the steel companies.

I ask unanimous consent that this article may be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. RANDOLPH in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, paralleling this article is an interpretive news article entitled, "The Outlook," an appraisal of current trends in business and finance.

I also ask unanimous consent that this article be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, the article in general points out that inventories at the end of the last year were probably rather low for the amount of business being done and that the reaccumulation of inventories will be a powerful factor booming business in the first half of this year. I wish to read two paragraphs from this article:

> Nor is the prospective accumulation of inventories—mainly in steel itself and in goods made of steel—likely to be the sole force for good business in the months immediately ahead. Consumers also probably have relatively low or overaged inventories in their hands. For instance, there will surely be some buying of autos in the current 6 months, which, but for the steel strike and consequent car shortages, would have taken place in the second half of 1959.
> Similarly, spending on new plants and new equipment undoubtedly was held down in the past 6 months by the steel strike and resulting shortages, and there is even some evidence that new ordering of such equipment was restricted by uncertainties created by the strike. Probably in both respects some catch-up purchasing will be done in the current half year.

The article also points out that accumulation or reduction of inventories were powerful factors in the business cycles of the past dozen years. The recessions of 1949, 1954, and 1958 were all marked by purposeful reductions in inventories, while the periods of prosperity—one might say inflation—in between, were accompanied by increases in inventories.

The political settlement of the steel strike came at a very opportune moment. It enabled the President to say in his state of the Union message:

> Today our surging (economic) strength is apparent to everyone; 1960 promises to be the most prosperous year in our history.

The political settlement of the steel strike may well have such a result because, as the Wall Street Journal points out in the article from which I have read, reaccumulation of inventories is a substantial factor in recent business upturns, and inventories at present, particularly in items manufactured from steel, are relatively low. But, as the Wall Street Journal says, the gyration of inventory accumulation and reductions have played important parts in recent inflation and recession. These prospective accumulations will be at higher and higher prices.

The President made another remark in his state of the Union message which I think is applicable here. He referred to a reduction in the national debt saying:

> I prefer to think of such an item as a reduction in our children's inherited mortgage. [Applause].

It is interesting to speculate on how much the political settlement of the steel strike has added to our children's inherited mortgage. My opinion is that it is far greater than the $4.6 billion predicted as surplus in the 1961 budget.

The President, in his state of the Union message, pointed out that inflation's ravages do not end at the water's edge. He said:

> Increases in prices of the goods we sell abroad threaten to drive us out of markets that once were securely ours.

The President had referred to our balance-of-payments problem, saying that our surplus from foreign business transactions has in recent years fallen substantially short of our expenditures abroad. He said:

> We must meet this situation by promoting a rising volume of exports and world trade.

As I stated Monday, the President's own Department of Commerce, in November 1959, published an analysis of changes in U.S. shares of export markets for manufacturers for the years 1954–58. The study determined that the overall U.S. share of these world markets had indeed been reduced, but that the general decline was explained by serious losses centered in a few items—most notably motor vehicles and steel. In the same period—1954–58—steel imports doubled and automobile imports increased several times over.

The issue of U.S. News & World Report dated January 18, at page 41, includes a roundup of foreign reaction to the political settlement of the steel strike. I ask unanimous consent that a portion of this article be included in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. This roundup shows unanimous opinion that the political settlement of the steel strike means additional inflation in the United States and weakening in the strength of the U.S. dollar abroad.

These opinions are not to be casually dismissed in their domestic implications any more than in their forebodings in international trade. I recall that last year the principal argument in favor of an increase in the statutory limit on long-term Government obligations was the international implications of a statutory maximum below the market. Both the Treasury and the Federal Reserve officials pointed out that gold and dollar outflow reflected a lessening in confidence abroad about our ability to control inflation within the United States. Disquieting rumors about devaluation of the dollar were going to be put at rest by our determination to preserve the value of the dollar. And this determination was to be illustrated by our willingness to pay the price of dampening inflation by increasing interest rates on Government obligations.

The President, in his state of the Union message, reiterated this determination to seek the removal of what he called artificial barriers in the management of the huge public debt. He said:

> Removal of this roadblock has high priority in my legislative recommendations. [Applause.]

The financial newspapers and commentaries are now about as full of speculation about when the next increase in the Federal Reserve rediscount rate will take place as they are about when steel prices will be increased and how much. There seems to be little doubt that it will take place.

I have been generally sympathetic with the efforts of the Federal Reserve Board to dampen inflationary fires through monetary policy. I have not had any great confidence in the efficacy of monetary policy but have considered its exercise as a distasteful but necessary tool in the absence of wise fiscal measures and proper restraints on big business and big labor. However, my patience is about at its end. Even in a political settlement of disputes between these colossal powers, the public ought to receive some consideration. They must pay the price of monetary restraint in the form of higher interest rates on the national debt, housing, consumer financing, small business loans, community facilities, schools, and everything else. In short, they are being taxed in the form of tight money to compensate for the cupidity of big business and big labor. In addition, they are soon to be taxed in the form of higher prices for steel in all of its many forms.

The New York Times on Tuesday, January 12, contains a story referring to a statement by Malcolm P. McNair, Lincoln Filene professor of retailing at the Harvard Graduate School of Business Administration, in a speech he made at the convention of the National Retail Merchants Association. I quote from this article.

He said that his recent optimism on an end to inflationary pressures was now beginning to look like "wishful thinking." He continued:

> It now seems clear that the Government has maneuvered a settlement of the steel strike that is inflationary in its implications. Within a few months there will be higher steel prices, and there is now an increased likelihood that the process of inventory rebuilding in the coming months will generate renewed inflationary pressures. In the meantime, the speculative boom in the stock market and in real estate.
> How much farther can all this go? We have seen, and shall continue to see, grave Government financing problems. We had tight money throughout most of 1959, and if we add up the credit necessary to sustain all the forecasts we have made for 1960—the increased buildup, the higher consumer credit for the purchase of automobiles, the increased borrowing of State and local governments and the needs of business for expansion of plant and equipment—we can readily apprehend that money will get even tighter, and historically we know that sooner or later a prolonged period of tight money has always led to substantial business readjustments.

Professor McNair referred also to the increasing imbalance of international trade, bringing about a reduction of this country's gold reserves, and the cost inflation that is not only pricing U.S. goods out of world markets but is subjecting domestic industry to rising foreign competition.

He remarked that "some astute foreign observers believe that ultimately the United States will be faced with the dilemma of either deflating costs and prices or of devaluing the currency," and added:

So far there is little indication of willingness to accept the cost deflation alternative.

On Monday I referred to the fact that there were many ways to increase steel prices and predicted adjustments and definitions and classifications of the multitudinous steel products.

In the January 9 issue of Business Week there is an article entitled "Steel Now—Bill Still To Come." The editors of this authoritative business publication say:

But it's perfectly clear that steel prices will go up.

The speculation is about how much and how soon. I quote from this article as follows:

How much more is a mystery. Estimates of from $2 to $3 a ton increase are being bandied about this week, but these estimates are meaningless. There's informed speculation that when the increases come they will not follow the traditional pattern of across-the-board boosts in base prices. It's far more likely they will come bit by bit, imposed first on one mill product then another, and set first by one company and next time by another.

For scores of other industries, the settlement in steel has had an effect like the dropping of that other shoe. Businessmen who saw only two alternatives—fresh steel shortages or inflation—guess they know what to expect now.

They will probably start building their own steel inventories faster now, to beat as much as they can the eventual steel price increase. There's almost as good a chance that many other industries will try to push through their own price increases ahead of time.

There will be some dampers on the upward pressures. Federal monetary and fiscal policies will hold back some of the pressure. Rising productivity will help. And politics may well affect the issue again.

Autos: The auto industry provides a picture of what may happen in dozens of other industries. Last year, the auto makers set 1960 model prices with so fine a margin that there's no room in them even for a small steel-price increase. Since steel prices will go up, auto prices will go up, too.

But how they'll go up is another matter. The increases could well be hidden in extra dealer charges. The dealers would recoup by shaving their trade-in offers. And the net result would be that the retail customer would hardly be aware of the increase.

Whether it will happen this way depends on the extent of steel-price rises. But if piecemeal increases do not spread far before October, the auto makers may get through the 1960 model year without a formal increase of their own. Detroit obviously expects the settlement in steel will boost 1960 auto sales.

The auto industry, like scores of others, is banking on a record sales year now that its steel supplies are assured.

The Washington Evening Star of Monday, January 11, contains an article based upon another article from Steel magazine which predicts that across-the-board price increases by steel companies are not likely before December 1, when the first wage increase goes into effect. The article goes on to say, however: "but selective raises will come before then. Extra charges also may be increased. Specialty items requiring a lot of production man-hours are prime candidates for early action," and further stated:

Because the contract settlement with the United Steelworkers Union assures labor peace, steel companies will go on a production bender during the first half of the year and pour out a record 70 million tons of steel, the magazine forecast.

The mills got off to a good start, producing 2,707,000 tons last week, operating at 95 percent of the industry's 1960 rated capacity. The 1960 annual capacity of 148,570,970 tons is up by 1.9 million tons from the 1959 figure.

Of 50 executives interviewed by Steel, 45 agreed steel prices will be raised eventually. The magazine said if and when the price raise comes, it won't affect all steel products.

"Competition from aluminum may discourage increases in stainless steel. Prices of barbed wire, nails and fence can't be hiked because foreign producers are underselling American makers now.

Mr. President, I know that last fall there were in my own State large supplies of barbed wire, nails, and similar items imported from abroad, and ready to be sold at retail in my State.

Mr. President, many other points could be raised about the political settlement of the steel strike. For example, did not the settlement circumvent the Taft-Hartley Act, by undermining and making a mockery of the factfinding procedures and the provisions of the act which call for such disputes to be referred to the Congress when the factfinding and injunctive procedures of the act fail?

Does not the political settlement make a mockery of the conciliation and mediation service? Why would either big labor or big management in the future pay any attention to the factfinding or conciliation or mediation efforts, when they must now know that these procedures are liable to be corrupted by clandestine deals by ambitious candidates for the highest office in the land.

There have been many serious suggestions about what ought to be done to improve the existing procedures, but I know of none, seriously advanced, which calls for their settlement in the manner in which the steel strike was fixed.

Most of the proposals I have heard call for some factfinding procedures. For instance, the Clark-Reuss bill would bring the interests of the consumer into the picture in some form, by means of public procedures designed to acquaint the public with its interests in possible solutions. I am not overly impressed with this or any other procedure, but it does have the virtue of minimizing the dangers of privately arranged agreements with political overtones.

COSTLIER FURNITURE—STEEL PACT TRIGGERS FACTORY PRICE BOOSTS; RETAILERS SET TO FOLLOW—PRODUCERS EXPECT INFLATION ATMOSPHERE TO EASE RISE, SEE LABOR COST PRESSURE—PATTERN FOR OTHER PRODUCTS?

(By Kenneth G. Slocum)

CHICAGO.—"Two weeks ago, I was considering raising prices a little in March or April, but since the steel settlement I've decided to increase them at least 3 percent and do it as soon as possible."

Speaking is Morris Futorian, president of Futorian-Stratford Furniture Co., a big Chicago-based producer of upholstered furniture. His comments are typical of those of furniture men interviewed at the winter furniture market, which is expected to draw over 50,000 retailers, manufacturers, materials suppliers and others during its 2-week stand. The market, which spreads over 96 acres of showroom space in the American Furniture Mart and the Merchandise Mart, will continue through this week.

It may seem strange that last week's steel settlement is triggering furniture price increases. The furniture industry is not a major steel user and, in any event, the larger steel firms promised that the contract settlement would not bring an immediate steel price rise. Steel wage increases, however, are sure to bring pressure for similar pay boosts in a wide range of industries, putting upward pressure on manufacturing costs generally. And the steel settlement, furniture men claim, creates an atmosphere in which price increases—which they say are overdue because of earlier cost boosts—will be easier to put into effect. This is a phenomenon that could help spark price increases in a number of other industries, too.

EASIER TO PASS ON BOOSTS

"This type of settlement makes it easier to pass on the price boosts of furniture producers and to bring my markup back up," says Albert Silverburg, owner of Allen Furniture Co., a retail store in Midland, Pa. "Most of my customers work at Crucible Steel Co., and they know that the more they make the more they will have to pay for most products, including furniture. I started buying more furniture here as soon as I heard about the steel settlement."

Even retailers whose customers won't benefit directly from the steel settlement argue that the contract will lead buyers to expect higher prices. "After all," says a New York City retailer, "everyone has been pointing out that the contract is inflationary."

"We don't use any steel to speak of but the steel settlement is likely to affect our costs," says J. Hardin Hill, executive vice president of Johnson-Carper Furniture Co., Roanoke, Va., producer of wood bedroom and dining room furniture. "Our veneer supplier is likely to have to raise his wages as a result of the increase the steel workers received. They'll pass that on to us."

Furniture makers and retailers, like most businessmen, expect the steel settlement to aid business generally: A sizable element of economic uncertainty has been removed. "All buyers will make bigger commitments now that the steel dispute is settled and that apprehension is behind us," says Elias Jones, merchandise manager of Jones Furniture Co., an Indiana, Pa., retailer.

MAKING THE BOOSTS STICK

Americans spent $4.3 billion for furniture in 1959, up 12 percent from the previous year. Continued brisk business, which the furniture men expect, would help to make the price increases stick. "The steel settlement won't make any difference in the price advance of 3 percent we have been planning to make in March, but the increase will be easier to get," says Lawrence Schnadig, president of Schnadig Corp., a Chicago furniture maker. "It's always easier to get more for your money when the general economy is secure and active."

Although some furniture makers, like Mr. Schnadig, came to the Chicago market with firm plans for raising prices, the steel settlement nailed down the decision in other cases. Fourteen of the 18 manufacturers interviewed here either are increasing prices at the market or plan to boost them by spring. Of two score retailers interviewed, four of every five plan to pass along any wholesale price advances to their customers.

"We edged up prices 2 percent in October. While we aren't raising prices at this market, all indications are that costs will force us into a general 3 percent increase in the spring," comments Clyne Crawford, president of Crawford Furniture Manufacturing Corp., a dining room and bedroom furniture producer based in Jamestown, N.Y. "Our cherry wood sources have boosted prices 5 percent or 6 percent since June, our labor costs us 4 percent more than a year ago and we know we are paying more for hardware in new lines."

SIX-PERCENT OR SEVEN-PERCENT WAGE INCREASE

Another big producer, United Furniture Corp., of Lexington, N.C., also a manufacturer of bedroom and dining room pieces, raised part of its line at this market. "About a quarter to a third of our furniture is new at this market and it's about 5 percent higher than comparable pieces in June," comments J. A. Philpott, sales vice president. "We had a 6 percent or 7 percent wage increase in the summer and we have to pay a premium for good lumber now because everybody's production is up." United had a general price increase of about 5 percent in the early part of 1959, Mr. Philpott notes.

A provincial cherry wood cocktail table produced by Brandt Cabinet Works, Inc., Hagerstown, Md., wholesales at this market at $34.75, up from $33.75 in June and from $32.75 last January. "Even though the wholesale increase was only $2 in a year, most retailers are moving the retail price from $59.95 a year ago to $65 now in order to maintain percentage profit margins," comments H. B. Hoopes, president.

Brandt's cherry wood supplier boosted prices 20 percent in September and the company recently signed a labor contract adding another paid holiday and raising company payments on insurance, Mr. Hoopes notes. The new contract raised labor costs about 2½ percent, he estimates.

Today we're paying $275 per thousand board feet for mahogany; in June it was $250," says Harry B. Hungerford, president of S. R. Hungerford Co., a Memphis firm specializing in popularly priced bedroom furniture of solid maple, cherry, mahogany, and walnut. The firm is introducing at this market two new furniture groups, representing about 20 percent of its volume, at prices about 4 percent higher than those on comparable merchandise last June.

OTHER PRICE BOOSTS

Other producers announcing boosts include White Furniture Co., Mebane, N.C., which raised prices 4 percent at this market, and Tomlinson of High Point (N.C.), also boosting prices about 4 percent. Moving counter to the general price uptrend is Kroehler Manufacturing Co., of Naperville, Ill., a big producer of upholstered furniture. At this market, Kroehler announced general price reductions on its "Sterling" line of furniture, a popularly priced "heavy modern" furniture in which the firm does the majority of its business. The reductions, ranging from roughly 5 percent to 15 percent, stem from "new production techniques and more efficient automatic equipment," R. E. Burow, merchandising manager, says. A trend bucker in the retail field is Sears, Roebuck & Co., which says furniture prices in its spring catalog are down 1.5 percent from a year ago.

With few exceptions, however, retailers are raising prices or expect to soon. "Wherever a manufacturer raises a chair or table at this market, my customers will be paying more this spring," states Will J. Delaney, owner of four furniture stores in Michigan and Indiana. "With property taxes, wages and everything else going up, I have to pass them on to stay in business."

"We've tried again and again to absorb wholesale price increases but they are at the point now that we can't," says Kenneth O. Race, vice president of Bass Furniture Co., with stores in Atlanta, Ga. "Freight, for instance, is killing us. I just walked out of a showroom where I found exactly the furniture I was looking for. But I didn't buy it. The producer is in Indiana and I have to find someone closer to home to hold down freight costs."

Memphis retailer Charles Schaffler, coowner of a store bearing his name, complains, "Our electric rate went up 18½ percent recently, along with gas and tax assessments. Clerks' wages are being boosted about 10 percent. Our profits are squeezed to the point we couldn't possibly absorb any more increases."

BOOSTING MARGINS

In some cases, retailers will mark up wholesale prices a bit more than in recent years to increase profit margins. "We usually try for a markup equal to 90 percent of the wholesale price," says Frank Connelly, partner in Nellett Carpet & Furniture Co., of Saginaw, Mich. "The year 1958 was so rough we were forced down to about 70 percent and 1959 wasn't much better. We think we'll hit 90 percent again this year."

"We boosted our markup slightly in 1959 and got no customer reaction whatsoever," says Robert Holloway, buyer for Ed Marling, Inc., a three-store, $4 million a year Topeka retailing firm which bills itself as "Kansas' largest home furnishings store." "We plan to raise it some more in 1960 to keep profits where they should be."

Furniture producers generally expect business to continue strong through the first half of 1960. "Our 1959 volume was up about 10 percent from 1958 and our backlog runs about 50 percent higher than a year ago," comments William Tomlinson, president of Tomlinson, of High Point, N.C. "The furniture business has shown remarkable vitality during the past 6 months. It would seem that with all the millions of dollars taken out of the economy by the steel strike and its side effects that it would have been very noticeable but it hasn't been."

Crawford Furniture Manufacturing had its biggest year in history last year, with sales up 40 percent over 1958, the company says. "We came into this market with our biggest backlog in history—production is sold out through mid-March," comments Mr. Crawford.

Other firms reporting substantial year-to-year increases for 1959 include the International and Karpen Furniture divisions of Schnadig Corp., which were up an average of 18 percent; and Kling Factories, Mayville, N.Y., up 20.8 percent.

APPRAISAL OF CURRENT TRENDS IN BUSINESS AND FINANCE

(By George Shea)

With nationwide inventories at the end of last year probably rather low for the amount of business being done, there is little doubt—as little as there can be about anything in the future—that business in the first half of this year is going to be close to or at record levels. The question in everyone's mind is what will happen in the second half.

That inventories are somewhat on the low side is strongly suggested by available statistics. True, at the end of November the total for the Nation was $89.7 billion, or almost $4 billion more than a year earlier. But this supply of all kinds of goods, from raw materials to finished products, was smaller than 2 years earlier. On a seasonally adjusted basis of comparison, it was a full $3 billion smaller than at its peak in the summer of 1957, just before the first rumblings of the 1958 recession began to be felt.

Furthermore, the fact that the accumulation, or reduction, of inventories is a powerful factor in business trends is easily demonstrated by a look at the cycles of the last dozen years. The recessions of 1949, 1954, and 1958 were all marked by purposeful reductions in inventories, while the periods of prosperity in between were accompanied by increases in standing supplies of goods.

These shifts were very large in terms of dollars. For instance, the increase in inventories in 1956, the middle year of the last upward leg of the business cycle, totaled $9 billion, while the reduction in 1958 amounted to $5 billion. Thus there was a total difference of $14 billion annually in the pace of production of the two years just as a result of inventory changes. That's three-quarters as much as the Nation's total exports in the record year 1951.

Nor is the prospective accumulation of inventories—mainly in steel itself and in goods made of steel—likely to be the sole force for good business in the months immediately ahead. Consumers also probably have relatively low or overaged inventories in their hands. For instance, there will surely be some buying of autos in the current 6 months which, but for the steel strike and consequent car shortages, would have taken place in the second half of 1959.

Similarly, spending on new plants and new equipment undoubtedly was held down in the past 6 months by the steel strike and resulting shortages, and there is even some evidence that new ordering of such equipment was restricted by uncertainties created by the strike. Probably in both respects some catchup purchasing will be done in the current half year.

This fact, furthermore, may well push some of the increased activity following the strike into the third quarter of this year. Great as is our industrial capacity today, it may be strained by the triple combination of current demand, demand postponed from last year, and demand for inventory building. If so, the post-strike boom could last more than 6 months. An additional factor pointing in that direction is that recent surveys, including one by this newspaper, show consumers to be in an optimistic frame of mind, willing and even anxious to do some spending for big-ticket items, such as refrigerators, furniture, or cars.

But what comes after that? There are several factors which suggest the possibility of a setback, while those which point to any further gains in overall activity are fewer and vaguer.

One downward factor is the reduced estimate of Federal spending that President Eisenhower has just announced. Just under $80 billion for fiscal 1961, the figure is $1 billion less than estimated earlier and also a bit less than was spent in fiscal 1959. These reductions don't amount to much, of course, but they contrast with the uptrend of recent years. And even if Congress takes a bit in its teeth and increases the total, the net result may well be a lesser outlay than if the Executive's effort to cut had not been made. Any substantial budget surplus also would tend to take more money out of circulation through taxes than is put into circulation through spending.

Another restrictive influence around or after midyear will be a less speedy accumulation of inventories than in the next few months. While some expansion of inventories may continue, as new and growing companies stock up and the older ones seek to push their wares by means of a plentiful choice for customers, the additions will surely not be as rapid as while present real shortages are being met.

A third depressing influence is that industrial managers may hesitate to increase their spending plans for new capacity until they see how much of early 1960's good business is of lasting character and how much represents mere catching up. Some increase in such spending is foreshadowed for the early months of 1960 over the reduced rates of 1958 and 1959, but the projected gain is not very big so far, and also may reflect just the catching-up mentioned some paragraphs above.

Finally, high and rising interest rates, and short supplies of funds for lending, may put a damper on business. Unless Congress takes the counteraction proposed by some legislators, these factors may pull down homebuilding, which already has turned down from last spring's high. They may hold down inventory building, which often is done with borrowed money. And they may restrict borrowing for expansions of industrial and other capacity.

Bullish factors include the natural growth of our economic system in per capita output, the continuing growth of the population, the probable approach of a new big wave of marriages as the millions of youngsters born in the 1940's approach adult years, and the hope of larger exports this year. But the latter hope is at best for an increase of $2 billion, which in a $480 billion economic system is small. And the other three factors, though powerful in the long run, have not historically prevented business setbacks.

[From the U.S. News & World Report, Jan. 18, 1960]

LONDON.—British authorities agree on these points: (1) Steel prices will rise and more inflation lies ahead for the United States; (2) U.S. money authorities will be forced to take action to try to restrain inflation; (3) as time goes on, Government may be forced to take more direct action to regulate wages and prices. The London Financial Times refers to the "fiasco of the steel dispute."

Zurich. Creeping inflation in the United States will continue. The steel settlement is viewed among Swiss bankers as an unconditional surrender to the wage demands of trade unions. The settlement also is viewed as a failure in efforts often talked about in the United States to stabilize the purchasing power of the dollar. Swiss bankers regard eventual devaluation of the dollar as almost inevitable.

Stockholm. The steel settlement may further weaken European belief in the strength of the U.S. dollar.

Ottawa. Informed opinion in Canada is that the steel settlement in the United States is a "disquieting victory for labor." While welcoming peace in steel, Canadian leaders foresee wage rises in the United States boosting prices to new highs. Since Canadian and U.S. economies are so tightly linked, inflation in the United States encourages more inflation here.

Bonn. West German steel companies expect American steel prices to increase in the future, despite calming statements by some U.S. officials. The prevailing impression is that the rising price trend in the United States will be encouraged by the steel settlement inasmuch as the industry lost its decisive battle againt inflationary wage demands.

Paris. A $4-to-$5-per-ton rise in U.S. steel prices is predicted for later this year. The settlement, therefore, is judged to be inflationary and likely to contribute further to deficits in the U.S. balance of payments. That means further weakening of the U.S. dollar.

Tokyo. The Japanese are convinced that additional creeping inflation lies ahead in the United States, hindering the attempt to narrow the gap between U.S. exports and U.S. imports. The settlement will tend further to weaken the dollar.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRUNSDALE in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

FEDERAL ELECTIONS ACT OF 1959

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2436) to revise the Federal election laws, to prevent corrupt practices in Federal elections, and for other purposes.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, at this time I should like to speak very briefly on the amendments which were offered yesterday at the close of the session; and I might say, by way of additional explanation, that the amendment, together with certain technical changes—which I referred to as amendments—relate to the reporting and disclosure of expenses in primary elections.

Let me say, by way of preface, that before the bill was reported by the Committee on Rules and Administration these amendments were defeated by a vote of 5 to 4 of the members of the committee. I offered the amendments in the committee, and I offer them again, as of yesterday, to the Senate for its consideration.

Mr. President, the first amendment would revise the definition of the term "election" in the bill to include primary elections. Of course, this would include the so-called presidential preferential primaries as well as caucuses, and conventions where candidates for Federal office are nominated.

The remaining amendments would make the necessary technical word changes throughout the bill to bring its provisions into agreement with the changed definition of the word "election."

The word "election" is very important, in my judgment, because our understanding of what constitutes an election is the very gravamen, the very basis upon which the amendments are offered and sought to be adopted.

As we all know, Mr. President, the present Corrupt Practices Act, the Act of 1925, and the bill before the Senate, are based upon two principal foundations: First, there should be certain limitations on the amount of money spent or contributed in election campaigns. Second, such expenditures and all contributions within the limitations should be reported.

What is the reason for reporting them? The reason, of course, is obvious. It is so that the people of this country may know, as they have a right to know, from what source or sources every candidate for Federal office derives his financial support.

As I said yesterday, there is nothing inherently evil or wicked in the use of money in modern election campaigning, but again I say, the people have a right to know and to understand exactly who are the persons who are willing to support with money their convictions and their beliefs as to the election of a candidate or certain candidates. The people have a right to know exactly who those persons are and to what extent they are willing to expend presumably their own funds to this end.

Therefore, it is honest, it is forthright, and it is in keeping with the American tradition, to disclose the sources of monetary contributions to candidates, since the legislative bodies and public officers supposedly obtain their power as a result of the free expression of the will of the people at the ballot box.

These things are so elementary, it would seem to me, Mr. President, that they do not require great elaboration.

In undertaking to report the bill we bore these basic principles clearly in mind. There was a division as to primary elections and conventions and caucuses.

It is my very strong conviction that there should be certain limitations on the amount of money spent or contributed in election campaigns, and certainly such expenditures and contributions should be reported. Those reports, as we further provided in the bill, should be readily available to the public. It is not that they should be filed with the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House alone, though that is good, but they should be filed in the district courts, or they should be filed with the officers of the States who are empowered and authorized and indeed required to keep such records, so that information may be obtained speedily in the area or region where the election is being held.

That, again, is all for the benefit of public information, all for the benefit of full disclosure, by the elimination of secrecy and the circumvention of what I think all of us agree is now an obsolete enactment of law, the 1925 Corrupt Practices Act.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. I see the distinguished Senator from South Dakota would like to address to me a question.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. If the Senator will yield I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. HENNINGS. I am very glad to yield to the Senator from South Dakota, whose interest in this subject has been manifest for a considerable length of time. I am sure that throughout the course of his distinguished legislative career the Senator has had many occasions to give it much thought. One instance which we all recall was especially emphasized in the Senator's own legislative career in this body. It came to the attention of the entire Senate and of the country.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, anyone who runs for Federal office is concerned with this subject, of course.

I have noted with considerable interest the work of the distinguished Senator from Missouri in this regard. I am glad the pending bill is before the Senate today. I hope that when action on it is completed it will make a substantial contribution to the election standards and requirements throughout the Nation.

Mr. HENNINGS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. With respect to the filing of reports, I think it is highly desirable that whatever reports may be required by law should be filed at a point where they will be readily available to the constituency which is concerned with the candidate making the report, or his committee.

The Senator referred to filing such reports in the district courts.

Mr. HENNINGS. With the clerk of the district court, I will say further.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. What would be the requirement, in the case of an election, where there is more than one Federal court district in the State?

Mr. HENNINGS. It is stipulated that the candidate may file a report in the district court for the district within which he resides.

I may say to the Senator that if in a given State there are State officials who are required by law to keep the records of elections, filing will be with them.

For example, in a State which includes several districts, it would not be necessary for the campaign manager or the campaign treasurer to travel across the State, as might be the case in some of our more populated areas, to file the information. He would file it at his own county seat, or in his own town or community, with the officer who is empowered to receive reports of elections under State law.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. In my State of South Dakota the report would be made to the county officials if a county candidacy were involved; but if the candidacy involved more than one county, and was concerned with a State office, the report would be filed with the secretary of state.

Mr. HENNINGS. I assume—if I may in turn ask the Senator a question—that there is State authorization for the filing of such reports.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. That is correct.

Mr. HENNINGS. There being a State authorization, that would suffice. We have tried to make this process less burdensome, and not more burdensome, to the candidates, their treasurers, the chairmen of their respective committees, and other adjuncts to the campaign for public office. We have required, instead of six reports annually, four reports annually during election years. Bearing in mind the possibility of having to go great distances or having to mail a report which might not reach its destination within the period of grace provided for under the bill, we have provided—and the committee unanimously agreed to this provision, after considerable thought and many, many hearings—that a candidate may file with the properly authorized official, authorized under State law. He may file a report in his own Federal district courthouse, or such other place State law may require.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Does the bill specifically provide that the report, when filed, shall be made available to the public?

Mr. HENNINGS. Indeed so. Not only would it be made available to the public, but it could be copied or photostated. Modern means of reproduction might be used, at the expense of the person copying or making a facsimile of the report so filed.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The provisions of the bill with regard to the filing of the report and making it available to the public are not limited to the amendment which is pending, and to which the Senator was earlier addressing his remarks, are they?

Mr. HENNINGS. No, indeed. I am glad that the Senator asked further questions on the subject upon which I undertook to touch yesterday in my overall summation of the purposes and some of the provisions of the bill. This provision does not bear upon the so-called primary amendment, except that, should the primary elections amendment be adopted, it would then, of course, apply, as it would apply in all other particulars, to the report required to be made relating to primary elections, conventions, and party caucuses.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Several details of the bill are worthy of comment, and, for the most part, commendation. But no part of the bill is more important than that providing for the report. I am one of those who believe that if there is adequate light and publicity about what is going on, the people can be trusted to apply their own remedies at the ballot box, if they do not like the source of the funds, the nature of the funds, or the amount of the funds involved.

Mr. HENNINGS. My friend has well stated the basic philosophy of that portion of the bill—full reporting, based upon the premise that some of us think the candidates should not be ashamed of their support. They should not conceal the source of their financial support. Those are things with respect to which the public is entitled to information before going to the polls, in order to judge, along with other qualifications of a given candidate, what sort of public officer he might make—and, to use an extreme example, which I think is happily not frequent, what pressures he may be subject to, and to what groups or individuals he may be beholden.

That is the purpose of the reporting requirement. To me it is a straightforward declaration of purposes as embodied in the bill, which was reported unanimously, I am glad to say, by the Committee on Rules and Administration. It was not, however, agreed upon in that committee that the provision relating to primaries should be incorporated in the bill as reported. That I regretted; but I still feel that we have made substantial progress in reporting a modern bill, a bill which moves toward more complete disclosure, and a bill which establishes a limitation upon campaign expenditures.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. I am very glad to yield further.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I have noticed with interest the several amendments which have been printed and are proposed to be presented. There is one of the amendments with respect to which I should like to address a question to the distinguished Senator from Missouri, chairman of the committee reporting the bill, although that amendment is not immediately before us.

I refer to the amendment proposed to be offered by the distinguished Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER], which would establish a basis of tax income credit for 50 percent of the contribution made to a political committee, or some such provision. I am not attempting to give the details of the amendment, other than to point out that it relates to a tax credit in the form of a deduction from taxable income of some portion of the political contribution made.

The amendment would amend the Internal Revenue Code. In view of that fact, I am wondering if the Senator and the staff working on the bill have considered the possible effect of that amendment, if it were adopted and attached to a bill originating in the Senate.

Mr. HENNINGS. I happen to have been more or less engrossed in this task for the past 5 years, having served for about 6 years on the Privileges and Elections Subcommittee, and having been involved in several of the election contests and inquiries during that period of time.

The inquiry of the Senator from South Dakota is timely, even though the amendment to which he refers is not before us at this time. We desire to develop every phase of this discussion, of course.

The amendment referred to was rejected by me, for one, this year. I drafted the original bill and several subsequent bills, and had much to do with drafting the bill which was ultimately reported, although it did not contain all that I wanted it to contain. We considered this proposal, and it seemed to me at this time that such a provision should, perhaps, originate in the House of Representatives.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. That was the point to which I was addressing my inquiry.

Mr. HENNINGS. I think that disposes of it. There have been several suggestions emanating from respectable sources as a result of consideration of this phase of election financing, but we did not feel that the proposed amendment had any part in the present bill.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. At this time it was not my intention to go into the merits of the proposal but merely to suggest that if there were any likelihood that the amendment would be considered by the Senate, it would seem to me that the committee handling the bill might wish to consider offering an additional amendment containing a separability clause, so as to protect the bill as a whole from any possibility of its being held unconstitutional by reason of their being incorporated in it an amendment to the Internal Revenue Code.

Mr. HENNINGS. I appreciate the thoughtful Senator's suggestions as to that point. I may say that that amendment was never considered this year. The full committee took the bill up in executive session at the first session of this Congress, as it had in 1957 and 1955. This amendment was never discussed. The provision to which the Senator is referring was never offered as an amendment in committee; nor was it discussed in committee as a possible amendment to the proposed legislation. I think the Senator's point and observation are very well taken indeed. I thank him for them.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. I yield.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. I should like to ask the Senator for an explanation of the proposed deduction. As I understand, the deduction is a $10 credit on the tax. Is that correct?

Mr. HENNINGS. To which amendment is the Senator referring?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. I am referring to the Kefauver amendment.

Mr. HENNINGS. The Senator from Virginia is referring to the amendment proposed to be offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER], as I understand.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Yes. As I understand the amendment, it would permit a deduction of $10, as a credit.

Mr. HENNINGS. That is not a part of the bill before the Senate at this time. It was never presented to the committee, as I have undertaken to indicate in response to the inquiry of the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. I thought perhaps the Senator could explain the second part of the amendment.

Mr. HENNINGS. There is nothing in the purview of the pending bill which contemplates such a provision at this time.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. I suppose the amendment will be offered.

Mr. HENNINGS. It will not be offered by me, I assure the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. I gather from that statement that the Senator is not enthusiastic about the amendment.

Mr. HENNINGS. I will have to play it by ear so far as that is concerned, because the amendment came to my attention only today. I do not know whether it has been printed as yet.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Yes; it has been printed.

Mr. HENNINGS. It was probably printed last night.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. I should like to know if the provision means that a credit would be given. First $10 is taken off as a deduction from the tax, as a credit. That is taken from the tax after it has been estimated. Then there is another section which permits other credit. As I understand the amendment, it would be possible to deduct political expenses from the income tax. That could not be correct, could it?

Mr. HENNINGS. I assume the Senator from Virginia is aware that tax credits and tax deductions are normally mutually exclusive, in terms of tax legislation. However, I would rather have the Senator from Tennessee undertake to explain his own amendment, because it was not presented to the committee.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. It was not acted on by the committee?

Mr. HENNINGS. It was not acted on one way or the other, I may say to my friend, the distinguished senior Senator from Virginia. I appreciate his interest and his inquiry. It was not presented to the committee. It was not voted up or down. It is not a part of the bill. It is not one of the amendments proposed to be offered by any member of the committee, so far as I know.

To continue with a brief résumé of the primary elections provision embodied in the amendment offered yesterday, Mr. President, the present Corrupt Practices Act and the bill before the Senate both provide for disclosure in general elections for Federal offices. We know that both—that is, the 1925 act and the 1959 bill—fail to include primaries or caucuses or conventions. In my judgment, this is indeed a very serious omission. After nominations are made, the voting public is confronted with a choice as between two or more candidates. For that reason it has always seemed to me, since I have been able to give consideration to the matter, that primaries can be just as important as general elections and, in many instances, more important. Therefore, when we in the United States think about elections we think about a primary, a convention or caucus, and a general election, the latter, of course, being predicated upon the former. I cannot for the life of me see why there should be any reluctance on the part of candidates to disclose the names of the persons who have contributed, or how much they have contributed. Why should not the people know about such things?

We talk about secrecy in Government. We talk about secrecy of Senate payrolls. We talk about secrecy of salaries of committee staffs. Here we get into another realm of obscurity and obfuscation and meandering doubt, where the people never really know who are the persons behind the men they are voting for, financially, generally, and in other respects.

I am not suggesting that for the most part the people who contribute are not good citizens. We do know of instances, however, where certain special interest representatives, certain groups, and even some elements of the underworld have been known to contribute, albeit sometimes deviously—under the counter or under the table, as we call it—money to political campaigns. To eliminate this practice, criminal penalties have been provided, not only for failure of disclosure of such matters by the candidates within the realm of their knowledge, but also for failure of certain contributors, in the amount of over $50, to disclose that they have contributed.

I believe it is time, in this fateful test of our form of government, to make our elective process one of candor and honesty, and to let the full light of information and public opinion be brought to bear upon what is really happening in a campaign for election. Most of these things are great mysteries to a number of our citizens and, I might even say, to a vast majority of our people. Sometimes a man makes a contribution of $10 or $5, and thinks he has made a very large contribution. Ofttimes a candidate is so hard pressed in a primary that he is outdone and outmatched incalculably.

I know, Mr. President, in my own case, that in my first primary for the Senate, I had in opposition to me the President of the United States, the Governor of my State, the mayor of St. Louis, the chairman of the national committee, the national committeeman, and the chairman of the State committee. They were all ranged on the other side. I had this matter rather forcefully brought home to me when I found that I was sending $25 into some county to take voters to the polls, while the other side was sending $3,000, $4,000, or $5,000. But under our present law, such contributions never had to be reported. So no one ever knew the source of this great largesse. I daresay many of us have been in similar circumstances.

That is why, among other reasons, I think those who have a financial interest in campaigns should be held up to the light. They should not be ashamed of it. They should not be ashamed of their candidates. They should not be ashamed of their full and lawful participation in political campaigns. It is a badge of good citizenship if a man contributes to a candidate in whom he believes or to the party in which he believes. Why should not that be a matter of record and a matter for public inspection?

Of course, if the people are to have full knowledge, it is not enough that the reports show the money spent in a campaign for a general election. They are entitled to know the whole story, because we all know that half a story can be quite misleading.

If Federal elections are to be accompanied by public disclosure, it certainly should be full disclosure, and this means complete financial disclosure throughout the entire process of the election. Anything less, it is my very deep conviction, is not sufficient to meet the requirements of 1960, in this year of great crisis when many important decisions affecting the world and our country are to be made. Why do we not start by being honest, forthright, and candid about these matters ourselves? By many of our statutory enactments and laws, we require of others the disclosure of many things relating to their transactions. But here we sit in the U.S. Senate, and some of us seem willing to have a primary election process—which in many States means election; the only contest there is—carried on in secrecy and in darkness, without any public understanding of what is really being done behind the scenes by many of the persons who would undertake to control our destinies. For this reason, I have constantly urged, as I did in the first bill in 1955, the inclusion in our election laws of primaries, caucuses, and conventions.

I may also say that if we are to have full disclosure in Federal elections, it will also be necessary to bring within the purview of the reporting provisions of Federal law, committees which operate within a State, but in the Federal elections. In some of the largest States, literally scores of committees are organized for the sole purpose of raising funds to support a candidate. I intend at the appropriate time, after action on the pending amendment, to offer another amendment which, as was stated yesterday, would prevent the proliferation or growth of innumerable committees in a State, for the purpose of living within the letter, but not within the spirit, of the law, so that every time a candidate finds his expenses are running high it will not be advantageous to set up another committee for the sole and exclusive purpose, or indeed, for collateral purpose, either, of raising more money.

I believe I presided throughout the investigation of an Ohio campaign some years ago. We found that committee after committee throughout the length and breadth of that great State was being set up, not for the violation of any law, but for the purpose of collecting enormous sums of money for a late and great Senator. But there was not any limit. I believe that that campaign involved something like $3 million, insofar as we could ascertain, within that one State to elect a Senator. We know that in some of the more populous States this kind of thing is done, and done openly, without concealment. It is done within the law. There is no law violation involved at all.

So if there is to be the maximum disclosure, to which the American people are entitled, I believe that both of the provisions proposed must be adopted, unless we want to fool ourselves, which is never a good thing, even though it is human nature to want to do it, or unless we want to fool the American public, which is not good public morals.

Over the course of many years, a number of arguments have been raised in opposition to the inclusion in our Federal election laws of primaries and committees within a State. One of the objections has been a constitutional objection. It has been argued, and argued with much force and conviction, that committees operating in only one State are activities and organizations which fall within the exclusive jurisdiction of the States. That argument will be made today, I assume. I would make it if I were an advocate for the other side of this case. It is argued that a primary election is the State's business, even though it involves a Federal official, and that the Federal Government has no business interfering in any sovereign State, by inquiring into a primary. However, fortunately, the Congress itself has answered that argument, and the answer has demolished the argument, because today there are on the statute books several laws which regulate primaries. I shall mention one which may be of great interest to Senators: The Taft-Hartley Act provision which prohibits the making of contributions or expenditures by corporations or by labor unions applies to primaries as well as to general elections. The prohibition of individual campaign contributions in excess of $5,000 to a candidate or a political committee during 1 calendar year covers not only elections, but also nominations. That has been settled by the Taft-Hartley Act and the Hatch Act; and, so far as I can determine, no Member of this body has spoken in opposition to those provisions, although doubtless some will oppose the pending amendment on the ground that it is unconstitutional and constitutes an invasion of the rights of sovereign States. However, such a provision seems to be satisfactory when it applies to labor unions and to corporations.

Furthermore, the general language of the Hatch Act which prohibits Members of Congress from soliciting or accepting money from Federal Government employees, carries the implication that primaries are within the purview of the prohibition. This broad interpretation was adopted by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of U.S. v. Wurzback (280 U.S. 396 (1929)).

The Supreme Court has also answered this argument by upholding the power of Congress to regulate primaries insofar as they are an integral part of the Federal election process—U.S. v. Classic (313 U.S. 299, 1941).

Another argument presented is that even without Federal regulation, State laws provide sufficient requirements as to disclosure of facts pertaining to campaign financing.

It is true that many States have very thorough disclosure laws, however, we are dealing with election to Federal office; and the people of the Nation as a whole have an interest in every Federal office, and are entitled to reporting on the national level.

It has also been suggested that the inclusion of primaries in the Federal statute is directed against certain regions of our Nation where primaries are tantamount to election. This, however, is not the case. I should like to point out that the State of Illinois, which does not have a reporting statute, would be among the States primarily affected by this amendment.

The question before us is quite simple: Do we want the full disclosure which the people of our Nation have a right to expect; or do we want large areas of campaign financing to remain secret and forever foreclosed from public inquiry and public scrutiny?

Mr. President, the yeas and nays have been ordered on the pending amendment; and I shall now ask that the question be put, if no other Senator desires to speak at this time on the pending amendment.

After the vote on the pending amendment is taken, I shall offer the other amendment.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRUENING in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, I must object to that. Anyone can look around the Chamber and see that obviously there are not 50 Senators present. There are no more than six.

I will withdraw my objection because I note that my wonderful friend from Delaware [Mr. FREAR] is in the Chamber. He seems prepared to make a speech. While I believe there should be at least 50 Senators to hear him, if he is willing to speak to a lesser number I am willing to sit here and listen.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Montana? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

JUSTICE DEPARTMENT'S APPEAL TO SUPREME COURT IN DU PONT-GENERAL MOTORS CASE

Mr. FREAR. Mr. President, I am sure that only the Presiding Officer and Senators who are present can really appreciate the significance of the statement of the Senator from Louisiana. I am deeply grateful to him, and also to the Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD].

The message which I have to deliver is extremely important. It will require only a few minutes. I am hopeful that Senators who are not present will take advantage of the opportunity to read the RECORD tomorrow morning and be fully and legally informed.

Mr. President, a few hours ago the Department of Justice appealed to the Supreme Court the decision of Federal District Judge Walter J. La Buy in the Du Pont-General Motors case.

This case, in which the Government seeks to force the Du Pont Co. to divest itself of 63 million shares of General Motors stock, most of it acquired more than 40 years ago, has already been dragging through our courts for 11 long years.

I have no idea, Mr. President, what this litigation has cost the Government and the taxpayers, as well as the defendants, over this long period, but the figures must be staggering.

The appeal filed by the Department of Justice will prolong this litigation, and continue to engage the time and talent of the Government's attorneys for at least another year. I submit that a better course is available, and the Department of Justice knows it.

On a previous appeal, decided 3 years ago, a minority of the Supreme Court—four of the six Justices who took part—decided that because the Du Pont Co. owned 23 percent of the stock of the General Motors Co., there was created a "reasonable probability" that Du Pont would have a preferred position in supplying General Motors with finishes and fabrics. While the four Justices, in a new interpretation, held that this was in violation of section 7 of the Clayton Act, they also found that during the preceding 40 years "all concerned in high executive posts in both companies acted honorably and fairly, each in the honest conviction that his actions were in the best interest of his own company and without any design to overreach anyone, including Du Pont's competitors."

The case was remanded to Judge La Buy who conducted lengthy hearings on an appropriate remedy. His decision last fall directed the Du Pont Co. to transfer to its stockholders the right to vote its General Motors stock, established regulations for trade relations between the two companies, prohibited Du Pont from acquiring any more General Motors stock, and prohibited anyone from serving as an officer, director, or employee of both companies. Furthermore, the General Motors stock allocable to Christiana Securities Corp. and Delaware Realty & Investment Co., in which members of the Du Pont family have substantial interests, has been sterilized; that is, it may not be voted at all. Neither can any General Motors stock be voted that is owned by or allocated to officers or directors of Du Pont, Christiana, and Delaware, and members of their families residing in the same household with them. The companies accepted this decision. The directors of the Du Pont Co. who were on the General Motors board resigned from that board, and the one General Motors director resigned from the Du Pont board. A distinguished former Member of this body, Hon. Scott W. Lucas, has been designated by Judge La Buy as the monitor to oversee the pass through of the voting rights of the General Motors stock owned by Du Pont.

The La Buy decision was hailed by scores of newspapers, large and small, throughout the United States, as fair and equitable. The Department of Justice has appealed it primarily because the court did not order a distribution of Du Pont's General Motors stock to the Du Pont stockholders. The fact is, of course, that Judge La Buy found it unnecessary to order divestiture to carry out the Supreme Court's mandate. Weeks of testimony also convinced him that an order for divestiture under present tax law would be "unnecessarily harsh and punitive" upon the 1 million stockholders of both companies. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal on October 5, 1959, had this to say:

> Well, the Government can appeal the plan to the Supreme Court if it wishes to do so. But it appears to us the better course would be to accept the decision gracefully. For an appeal would no longer be another skirmish against Du Pont and General Motors. It would be an outright attack against a decision that protects thousands of innocent people from injustice by their own Government.

It is hard for me to believe, Mr. President, that the agency of the Government dedicated to justice can be indifferent to the tax penalties and destruction of stock values which its plan would inflict upon citizens and charitable and educational institutions which hold stock in these two companies. The facts are on record, and if the Attorney General of this administration sincerely believes divestiture is the only proper and effective remedy, there is, as I have said, another course open to him.

Let him, and let others in this administration, join me in supporting the bill which I introduced nearly 2 years ago to facilitate antitrust enforcement by eliminating the tax penalties upon forced divestiture.

My bill would not affect the two large corporations, Du Pont and General Motors. It would not save either of them one penny. It would not relieve Du Pont stockholders of their liability for taxes on any capital gain realized on the distributed General Motors shares. It would relieve them of the present law's penalty which would require them to pay income tax on the full market value of the shares received at the time of a forced distribution resulting from antitrust proceedings.

As the New York Times editorial of October 12, 1959, stated:

> In the light of the present tax law it is easy to understand Judge La Buy's reluctance to make Du Pont give up its GM stock. A Du Pont stockholder who received GM stock from Du Pont would have to pay straight income tax on the current market value of the stock he received. His liability, depending on his particular tax bracket, would run from 20 to 91 percent.
> The tax committees of the House and Senate approved differing measures to reduce this obstacle in the final weeks of this year's session. The Treasury accepts the concept of tax relief and the Justice Department actively advocates it as a means to more effective antitrust enforcement.
> There should be an early effort to enact such legislation.

In 1956, Mr. President, when the present administration was confronted with a similar problem, it readily agreed to a provision of the Bank Holding Act to postpone the imposition of taxes on stockholders who received stock in a forced distribution under that act until they sold the stock.

At the insistence of Mr. Justice Douglas, who in 1938 was chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, a similar provision was written into the Public Utility Holding Company Act.

It is curious, Mr. President, that the administration which embraced the Bank Holding Company Act has not proposed similar legislation in the antitrust field. However, I have seen no mention of this problem in the messages which come to us from time to time suggesting the need for congressional action.

So, today, I call on the Attorney General and the Secretary of the Treasury to join me in encouraging prompt action to enact legislation such as proposed in S. 200, which I introduced on January 12, 1959. If they want divestiture, this is the way to obtain it without inflicting serious and unrealistic penalties upon one million persons of all ranks of life whose only crime is that they have invested in either Du Pont or General Motors stock. This is the way to end 11 long years of litigation which now promises to stretch indefinitely into the dreary future. It is the way also to protect the interests of innocent stockholders in other corporations who may be subjected to similar divestiture proceedings in the days ahead.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, the Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR] is about to suggest the absence of a quorum. I should like to notify the attachés of the Senate that this will be a live quorum, and I hope Senators will be notified in turn to that effect.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRUENING in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DODD], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. HART], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. KERR], and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] are absent on official business.

I further announce that the Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS] is absent on official business in Latin America as a member of the Latin American Trade Subcommittee of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. KUCHEL. I announce that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ALLOTT] is necessarily absent.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] is absent because of the illness of his wife.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRUENING in the chair). A quorum is present.

FEDERAL ELECTIONS ACT OF 1959

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2436) to revise the Federal election laws, to prevent corrupt practices in Federal elections, and for other purposes.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, to the pending amendment, I submit the amendment which I send to the desk, and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. At the end of the Hennings' amendment, it is proposed to add a new section, as follows:

STATE PRIMARIES

SEC. 213. No person's name shall appear on a ballot or voting machine in any general election for a seat in the U.S. Senate or House of Representatives unless that person has been nominated in a primary election in which all registered or otherwise properly qualified members of his party shall have had an opportunity to vote: Provided, however, That such conditions shall not apply to names written by the hand of the voter: And provided further, That the regular nomination by primary election shall not be necessary for a candidate for Senator or Congressman whose party did not receive more than ten percentum of the votes cast in the previous senatorial or congressional election for the office to which he aspires.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, the pending amendment to which I have offered this amendment would seek to regulate State primaries and to tell us how we should conduct them.

I did not have any particular interest in this matter until the pending amendment was joined in by the Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING], although in New York State there is no primary. The Senator from New York testified on the floor, on yesterday, that his name came on the ballot and he became a candidate for the prevailing party because the Governor of New York State simply called him into his office—and it was not a smoke-filled room, because the junior Senator from New York does not smoke, and neither does Nelson Rockefeller—and—whack—the name of the Senator from New York went on the ballot. Only one man, the Governor of New York, picked him; and immediately the name of the junior Senator from New York went on the ballot.

Mr. President, I think that if a man has the courage to run for office, he should be willing to run in a primary; and so it is that I want my friend, the junior Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING], to have that great opportunity. As a result, after he has had the experience of running in a primary, he then will know better how to go about the business of regulating a primary.

In other words, Mr. President, this is an amendment to let the would-be regulator know something about what he would regulate. [Laughter.]

The experience which is had by those who run in many of the primaries is most interesting, indeed. In some of the primaries there are as many as 10 candidates, each one running against all the others. In the course of the primary campaigns, each candidate "knocks" all the others; often no candidate receives a majority of the votes cast in the first primary, and thus it is necessary to hold a runoff election. Sometimes 5 or 6 of the original 10 candidates proceed to endorse one or another of the remaining candidates who are to participate in the runoff election. Finally, one candidate wins in the runoff, and he becomes the Democratic candidate. Then, in the general election, he has to run against the Republican candidate, who has been sitting back, safe and comfortable, without having any trouble at all, just waiting for the Democratic candidate to emerge.

In the ensuing general election, the Republican candidate endorses all the critical things the other nine aspirants to the Democratic candidacy have had to say about the one who finally has become the Democratic candidate. So, in the general election, the Democratic candidate has to proceed to run for election all over again, but this time he has to try to win in competition against the Republican candidate, who up to that point has not been subjected to any trouble or difficulty whatever.

Mr. President, just think how comfortable it is to be a Republican candidate in a Southern State. In such circumstances, the Republican candidate has no trouble at all, up until the general election, for all the Republicans are for him. Furthermore, the Republican candidate then has very little difficulty deciding how to campaign, for in making his campaign speeches he simply endorses all the critical things the other Democratic candidates in the primary said against the Democratic candidate who finally won the Democratic nomination.

Would you not like to be a Republican, under the circumstances in New York, and have the Governor of your State say to you, "Won't you run?"

You would reply, "Well, I don't mind if I do."

Then the Governor would say, "Do you object to getting in by riding on my coattails?"

And you would reply, "Well, I don't mind if I do."

Mr. President, under those circumstances, the Republican candidate would have no expenses to pay; and if you were asked to run in the general election—if, for instance, the Governor of New York asked you to run in the general election, and if you did not smoke, and, of course, neither does the Governor of New York—what would be your expense? Just the expense of the shoe leather you would have to use in order to walk into his office.

Would it not be nice to ride along on the coattails of a popular Governor, with no expense and no trouble whatever? In that event, you are in; the Governor would ask you to run, and immediately you would be running for election to the U.S. Senate.

Mr. President, I am willing to go along with the pending amendment, and to let the junior Senator from New York have the power to determine the terms and conditions under which a Senator runs for office. I simply want him to be regulated in the same way.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield to me?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I yield.

Mr. HENNINGS. The amendment which I have offered, and which will be voted on following the vote on the amendment the Senator from Louisiana has offered to my amendment, provides, does it not, that caucuses and primaries shall be subject to this regulation?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Yes; but what would that mean? All one would have to do would be to walk into Nelson Rockefeller's office, when asked by him to do so, and immediately—at his request—be "in," be picked as the candidate; Governor Rockefeller would have picked him.

Mr. HENNINGS. Of course, Mr. President, I may not describe the matter nearly so well or nearly so graphically as it was described by the Senator from Louisiana when he referred to such a conclave with the Senator from New York. But I suppose that procedure might come within the general definition of a party caucus. Of course, we do not know how much it cost the Senator to get there.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I am sure it did not cost the junior Senator from New York one penny. Rockefeller is a millionaire already. [Laughter.]

But the junior Senator from New York likes that system. The Senator from New York said Nelson Rockefeller sent for him, and that that is why he is now a U.S. Senator.

There was no smoke-filled room; the Senator from New York does not smoke. Neither does the Governor of New York. But the Senator from New York, who does not have to run for the nomination, wants to tell us, "If you fellows are going to run against each other, I am going to regulate the primaries."

I know of no more democratic process than for the Senator to run in a primary election and then to have your name placed on the ballot. I want to accord that privilege to my friend from New York. I know he will prove that he will be elected by an overwhelming majority when he becomes a candidate. He has done a marvelous job in the Congress. I am sure the people of New York approve of what he has done. I want to accord to him the privilege of reporting every 5 cents in contributions. At this time his primary campaign contributions amount to nothing. But let me tell the Senator, when he gets ready to run against a good Republican, it is going to cost him something. I can tell him that from my own experience. I would like the Senator from New York to have the privilege of reporting every 5 cents received by him in contributions, and who contributed it, because it will be a very illuminating experience. I will promise the Senator his Republican opposition will tan his hide. They have done it to me. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I offer this amendment, and hope it will be adopted. There are only three States, so far as I know, which do not follow the democratic procedure of letting their citizens vote for those who will be the nominees of the major parties. These States are New York, Connecticut, and Indiana.

The late Senator Robert M. La Follette, Sr., was a great Senator. If anyone does not believe it, I invite him to go out to the reception room and see the picture of that Senator, who was picked by all Senators as one of the five greatest Senators of all time. This is what he said about State caucuses:

> Away in some retired room behind locked doors the masters of the machine sit in quiet conference. They have issued their orders to those in nominal control. The program of the convention is all prepared. The temporary and permanent chairmen have been elected in advance. * * * [Laughter.] These men have been selected by masters of the machine with considerate judgment. There will be no mistakes made. Men designated in advance will be recognized by the chairman for all important motions at the "right time." All troublesome points of order will be decided in the "right way." [Laughter.]

There is a man who knows something about it. Do Senators know why? Because he, who was the author of this quotation, is the same one who abolished the conference system of nominating candidates in the great State of Wisconsin. His picture is in the Senate reception room for all to see. He was selected as one of the five greatest Senators. That is what he thought about the conference system, which is the system which still exists in New York.

If we are to regulate the primaries, there should be no constitutional objection to our making it uniform by requiring that every State have primaries. A candidate's name should be placed on the ballot after election in primary elections. We wish to accord the Senator from New York the privilege of getting his name on the ballot, as is done in Louisiana, through the primary system, unless a candidate comes from a party having a small minority of votes of less than 10 percent. Then we accord him the right to have his name put on the ballot without a primary election. But if a Senator's selection is controlled by a powerful fraction, which has the power to put a man in the Senate, my amendment provides that he will have to offer himself for selection by the people.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I yield.

Mr. ERVIN. If I construe the Senator's amendment correctly, it proposes democratic processes in the selection of candidates. Is that correct?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. ERVIN. It is designed to give the power or the right, insofar as the selection of candidates is concerned, to the people themselves. Is that correct?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. The Senator is completely correct. Think what a great outrage it is. According to the testimony of the distinguished Senator from New York, himself, the Governor calls him in office. He then becomes the nominee of the party in the largest State of the Union, just because the Governor wants him to be. He did not even smoke a cigarette. He just called him in and said, "You're it. You're it." So he is. He is a great Senator, representing in part a great State. I have no doubt the people would approve of him. Let him prove it. The Senator would like to regulate primaries, so he should be willing to run in one, and I should like to accord him that opportunity.

I hope my amendment will be adopted. There are only three States that do not have primary elections. A Senator from the State of New York is denied the right to prove he is the choice of his party. I would like to accord that opportunity to my genial friend from New York. I think he would prove himself, and I think he should have the opportunity to run in such a primary election.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I am afraid my friend from Louisiana has me slightly bewildered. I thought he was going to speak with emphasis on the question of States rights when it comes to electioneering, but now he has spoken about the power to determine whether a State shall do the Governor's bidding and on the question whether a State shall select its candidates by means of primaries or conventions, or abolish conventions.

I think I am like the bureaucrat downtown whom a constituent of mine went to see. When he got through talking, he looked at the button the bureaucrat had on his coat, and the constituent asked him, "What do those letters BAIK mean?" The bureaucrat said, "They stand for, 'Boy, am I confused.'" The constituent said, "You do not spell 'confusion' with a 'k.'" The bureaucrat said, "You don't know how confused we are." [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I am hopelessly confused by this rather strange philosophic approach. I hope, therefore, that the Long amendment will be defeated. I hope the Hennings-Keating amendment will be likewise defeated. I have some different ideas about the matter, and I am not very much inclined to let the sovereign power of the Federal Government determine for the people of Illinois, in a contest for the selection of a party's nominee, whether the procedure is all going to come within the purview of a Federal statute. A primary is, after all, not an election, but a selection process.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes; but I would rather complete my statement.

Mr. HENNINGS. Does the State of Illinois have any reporting requirements whatsoever relating to primaries?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Absolutely no reports whatsoever are required.

Mr. HENNINGS. Or relating to any election?

Mr. DIRKSEN. No, none whatsoever.

Mr. HENNINGS. Illinois has no regulation whatsoever?

Mr. DIRKSEN. No regulation whatsoever. We have lived with it and have done pretty well, and I am content to continue under that system. Here are the election laws. They constitute about 350 pages. About half of those are devoted, in meticulous detail, to how one can become a nominee of a party. First of all is described who shall vote, whether a citizen is properly registered. There is nothing in the Federal statute with respect to that. Then it describes how a candidate gets on the ballot. If one wants to be a candidate for the U.S. Senate, he goes forth and gets for himself between 5,000 and 10,000 signatures, but if no party affiliation is indicated with the signatures, the petition can be invalidated by a canvassing board. There is nothing in this proposal to stop it that I know of. If there is, I have not encountered it.

The State of Illinois determines who shall vote in a primary election. It determines how many signatures there shall be. It determines the qualifications which one must have. Everything in connection therewith comes under the State law. Nothing in the bill which is pending before the Senate would modify that in the slightest degree.

But our law goes further. Under the State law we set up our party machinery. It provides how one may become a precinct committeeman. It provides how one may become a country chairman. It provides how one shall be elected chairman of the State central committee or a member of the State central committee. All the qualifications are set forth. Under a provision of State law one is required to carry a voter's registration card in his pocket. When the voter appears in a primary election, the judge or the clerk may challenge him, if he thinks there is cause for challenge. He may say, "We do not think you are entitled to vote."

All of that is done, not under the laws of the United States, but under the laws of the State of Illinois. When a voter shows up at a precinct the judge takes out the poll book. Is the voter's name inscribed in the poll book? The Federal law does not ask that, the State law asks it.

So nothing in the bill in the slightest degree touches all the requirements prescribed in the State statute before one can even have a petition validated and get his name on the ballot.

Then if the canvassing board or the secretary of state has any doubt about the matter, there will be an examination, name by name, to determine whether the addresses are proper, whether the signatures are correct, and whether the petitions in whole or in part ought to be thrown out. All that remains within the domain of the States.

If one is aggrieved and wants to take an appeal, the appeal is not under a Federal statute, but the appeal comes under the State law. There is not in the bill before the Senate a jot or a tittle, there is not a comma or an adjective, which would modify that in the slightest particular.

Now what a paradox there would be if it were necessary to operate under the State law and under the Federal law. The State can prescribe who may vote. I remind Senators that in our primaries only party affiliates can vote for Republican or Democratic candidates, as the case may be. They have to be qualified as members of the party. Yet under the Federal law as proposed to be amended, the United States enters the picture and says to the candidate, "If you are a candidate in the primary, we are going to determine how much you shall receive and how much you shall spend. We shall determine, here in the Nation's Capital, by the fiat of the law of the land, whether you have spent too much or spent too little."

It is proposed to go even further. Look at section 203(d)(1). That section is going to make the Federal Government a policeman, because it says—and this will apply to the primary—"You as a candidate will have to make every reasonable effort to ascertain what committee has been supporting you with radio, printed material, television, publications, newspapers, and so on."

The State of Illinois is 400 miles long, from the State of my friend ALEX WILEY at the north down to Cairo at the confluence of the Ohio River and the Mississippi River. How shall I know, 300 miles away, if a dozen people in Alexander County, where these rivers come together, meet at somebody's house some night and say, "Let us give DIRKSEN a lift. Let us all throw $100 into the hat. Let us buy some radio time. Let us go on TV"—if they have a TV station. "Let us buy some advertising in the newspaper."

The chairman of the committee, if there be such, might write to my office in Chicago, in Peoria, or in Pekin. The letter might come to the attention of a stenographer, of a secretary, or an administrative assistant. I may never see it. But under the language proposed I would have to make every reasonable effort to ascertain who supported me. And Senators should not forget that this will be a criminal statute. In the intensity of the political arena, I do not want somebody to come up on my blind side and say, "I think there is a letter in DIRKSEN'S file." That would not mean I had seen the letter, but there might be a letter in my file. It might say, "Dear DIRKSEN: We organized a little group. We got together a little money. We are going to help you. You do not even have to answer this letter and say 'Thanks.'"

Where does a reasonable effort to find out end? This will be a criminal statute. I have stated what information candidates are asked to provide.

We are going to let the State say who shall vote, who is qualified in the primaries, how many names are required on a petition, and all the rest that goes with it; but the sleuthing operation, as to the amount to be expended and the amount to be received, is to be determined by the Federal law.

The interesting thing about this bill is—and I am going to vote for it, if it gets the necessary modification—there is no limit placed on the county committee or on the State committee. There are limits on the congressional committee. There are limits on the senatorial committee. There are limits on the national committee. But there is no limit on the State committee or on the county committee, because those are not political committees under the definition carried in the bill. If I am incorrect, then let the proponents stand up and say I am, but as I read the language, with my feeble talent, that is what is provided.

If one wants to "rig" an election, all one has to do is to bail his money into the county committee, and do the business there. That is what will happen, if proposals of this kind are made effective.

In the earlier drafts of the bill it went so far as to provide that the treasurer of every county committee had to be bonded. Can Senators imagine the reaction of a very humble fellow in the township where I live, if a lawyer should walk up to him and say, "Joe, if I were you I would not serve as treasurer of the county committee." He would say, "Why?" The lawyer would say, "Well, you have to give a bond. This is an operation under a criminal statute. You have to make a report. One of these fine days they are going to have you in the 'can.'"

It will be difficult to get anybody to serve with such a provision in the law, and it was originally in the bill, when I went before the Committee on Rules and Administration and testified 2 or 3 years ago.

The bill has been very, very materially improved, but I shall not stand here and let the bill pass without lifting my voice against the further intrusion of the Federal Government and against having the long arm of Uncle Sam reach out to tamper with the rights of the States.

I praise the President of the United States, for in his state of the Union message he adverted to the fact that it is necessary to preserve and keep fresh the Federal-State system, for therein lies the very vitality of this country, with its diversity of interests.

If we go as far as is now proposed, then of course it will mean a deeper intrusion of the Federal Government into the picture. It must be obvious that I shall never give my voice and I shall never give my vote to that sort of thing.

There is a question in regard to this bill which somewhat disturbs me. I am not going to make a point of it, except to make the legislative history.

With respect to the amount of money which a candidate may spend, we are asked to lift the limitation very materially; to $50,000, or to 20 cents for the first 1 million votes cast in the last general election and 10 cents for those over 1 million, or to 20 cents for the first 1 million registered voters and 10 cents for those in excess of 1 million.

A big State such as Illinois has 4½ million voters. Twenty cents for the first million would mean $200,000. Ten cents each for the next 3.5 million would be $350,000. That would be $550,000 one could spend in the primary or one could spend in the general election.

I am for it. I believe in raising the limits. They have been all too low in times past.

This is the age of space and radio. Who knows when we shall have a campaign in outer space? Perhaps "Front Porch" HARMON will have a porch up on the moon the first thing we know. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARTKE] should not laugh at that.

Who knows what the limits are? The cost for television time is $150 a minute, if a candidate can get it. It is time to be a little realistic about expenditures. Politics requires money, and we shudder at the idea; but the more we project our country under the merit system and civil service and take away all the other incentives there may be for party workers, what is left? Either one of two things—either a great cohesive, energizing force that brings men out to do work at the polls, or the necessity of paying them. And, of course, we must energize the electorate. A candidate does not get newspaper space for nothing today, or time on the television or radio, or any other facility.

So I am for lifting the limit, and I subscribe to that proposal, but I point out that there is one little difficulty which I have tried to check. I am saying this today only to make the legislative history. Somewhere along the line this proposed law will be interpreted by the courts. With respect to section 207, which deals with expenditures by candidates, the laws of the State which may be involved are supervened and annulled.

It could conceivably be that under State law the limit of expenditures by a candidate for Senator might be $50,000, but under this provision he might spend $200,000. Suppose he should spend $100,000. He would be in complete conformity with the Federal law, but he would have violated the State law.

Suppose he becomes the successful nominee, and the Secretary of State telephones him and says, "Joe, I am sorry, but I cannot certify your name, because you violated the State law with respect to expenditure, and it is a criminal statute."

How are we going to make him certify the candidate? Of course, there is the cumbersome proceeding of mandamus. Then one must determine whether to go into the State courts or into the Federal court. In connection with fine questions of law like that, I should have to refer to distinguished lawyers like Judge ERVIN and Judge LAUSCHE.

Such a situation could happen. If there were intense political feeling, and a successful Republican who was strong in the State, running against a Democratic nominee with a general understanding that the Republican could lick him, if there were a Democratic Secretary of State, would it not be convenient for him to say, "I will not certify that Republican?" That could happen.

I raised the question in our policy meeting the other day. I have talked with the legislative counsel. I thought perhaps we should write into the bill the statement that it is the intent of Congress that the Federal Government shall preempt the field so far as limitations on expenditures and receipts by candidates are concerned. I defer to the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN], who has done so much work in this field of preemption.

Perhaps I see a ghost under the bed; but I have seen so many ghosts which became live ghosts—and this is my 25th year of legislative service—that I do not like to see these questions left up in the air, without having some words uttered on the floor of the Senate so that a learned judge in a robe can say, "What was the intent of Congress? What was said? What happened on the floor of the Senate when this question was before it?" At least there will be some feeble thoughts to guide him. The problem definitely exists.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. HENNINGS. I wonder if the Senator realizes that the bill was reported unanimously from the Committee on Rules and Administration.

Mr. DIRKSEN. What difference does that make?

Mr. HENNINGS. This difference: The section to which the Senator seems to direct a great deal of his attention, that is, the section relating to the candidates making every reasonable effort to ascertain what political interests supported them, was inserted over the objection of some of us, in order to reach an agreement and report a bill, at the suggestion and upon the insistence of the ranking minority member, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS]. I would be very glad to have that provision stricken. I hope the Senator will so move.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I shall so move.

Mr. HENNINGS. I am very glad to see that the distinguished Senator from Illinois, the minority leader, has espoused the doctrine of States rights. He comes from the State of Abraham Lincoln, the Great Emancipator. The Senator from Illinois is disturbed about procedures which bear no relationship whatsoever to anything contained in the bill. This provision has nothing to do with registration clerks.

Mr. DIRKSEN. How does the Senator think I got on the ballot in the State of Illinois?

Mr. HENNINGS. Apparently there are very few regulations in that State. The Senate had to unseat one man from Illinois because he spent too much money. There was one case which related to excessive expenditures in the State of Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Oh, yes.

Mr. HENNINGS. I will not mention the name of the candidate. The Senator spoke of that case after his study of the precedents.

Mr. DIRKSEN. As a matter of fact, he was here long before my time.

Mr. HENNINGS. The Senator and I serve on the Judiciary Committee together. He knows that some of these questions are a little complex, and he seeks to make the procedures appear ridiculous, onerous, burdensome, and cumbersome.

I invite the attention of my friend the Senator from Illinois to the fact that the 1925 Corrupt Practices Act, by which the Senator seems to lay so much store, an act of 35 years ago, contained criminal penalties.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Certainly.

Mr. HENNINGS. There were sanctions provided by law. Does the Senator suggest that we should have more reporting than we had in 1925? We propose to reduce the reporting to four times a year. The Corrupt Practices Act required reporting six times a year.

I do not believe the Senator practices law, but it is an old trick before juries, of course, to try to befuddle and obfuscate the issue so as to make it seem that the question involved is vast, complex, and difficult.

The question involved here is as simple as this: Does the Senator from Illinois want the people of his State to know who contributed to his primary, and in what sums, and who contributed to his general election, and in what sums, or does he not? Does he want the matter of the primary contributions to be shrouded in secrecy, to be withheld from public knowledge, to remain only in the bosom of the distinguished Senator and his advisers and colleagues and others associated with him, or does he think the public is entitled to know, as a part of the general election process, who contributed the money to nominate a candidate? Does the Senator wish to have the public enabled, by that measure, together with other facts and considerations, to determine the qualifications of a candidate for office?

Mr. DIRKSEN. My friend has made his speech——

Mr. HENNINGS. This bill has been called the clean elections bill. I appreciate the courtesy of the Senator in indulging me to make a few remarks. I believe that the Senator's remarks were not pertinent or apposite to anything contained in the bill, when he talked about registrars, and about a letter coming to his office, telling about a group of people who had decided to support him.

If the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS] would consent to remove that provision, I think we could get along very well, so far as the "policeman" aspect is concerned.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Now, let me take a little of my own time.

Mr. HENNINGS. The Senator has all the time in the world. There is no limitation.

Mr. DIRKSEN. At the first crack out of the box, the distinguished Senator from Missouri brings forth a bill and says he will join the minority leader in striking from it a provision which would make the Federal Government a policeman. It seems to me there is a confession right there that there is a little weakness in his bill to begin with.

Second, I point out to the Senator from Missouri that we have a legislature in the State of Illinois which meets regularly. As I remember, there are 51 members of the State senate and 153 members of the house of representatives, or perhaps more. Whenever they wish to place on the statute books an act dealing with contributions and receipts, they can do so, and we abide by their action, just as is the case in other States of the Union. That is what I mean when I say that this matter can be controlled at that level, because a primary is a selecting process. A person is not even a candidate for Federal office at that point; he is merely a candidate for nomination; and up to that point I will not vitiate and destroy the powers of my own State in that field. Whenever the General Assembly of the State of Illinois wishes to legislate in that field, it is free and uninhibited in so doing. That is the reason I am opposed to the amendment.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. If the weakness were not there, obviously, my friend from Missouri would not join with me in supporting an amendment to strike out that particularly offensive section.

I now yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois point out the language on which he relies for his statement that the regulations contained in the proposed act covering expenditures will not apply to local and State committees?

Mr. DIRKSEN. The Senator will find it on page 3, beginning at line 3, which reads:

> (3) The term "political committee" includes any committee, association, or organization which accepts contributions or makes expenditures.

And so forth. Then in parentheses it reads:

> (Other than a duly organized State or local committee of a political party.)

That is the clear exception in the bill. In all other respects its limitations apply.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. CURTIS. The distinguished Senator from Illinois has referred to the language appearing in the bill beginning at line 14, page 9, and running through line 9 on page 10.

I should like to clarify the record by making this statement. The pending bill was before the Committee on Rules and Administration for 2 or 3 years. An attempt was made to require intrastate committees to make reports, to which I was unalterably opposed. There were also attempts made to make the candidate responsible for all committees which operated in his behalf, and to provide that their expenditures were to come under the limitation provided for the candidate. In my opinion that would be entirely unworkable, and could not be carried out.

In order to resolve the controversy, the language I have referred to was offered. It would require a candidate to list and to make a reasonable effort—and by reasonable we mean he would not be required to make an unreasonable effort—to ascertain what the committees are doing publicly, such as publishing newspaper advertisements and the like, and to list them; and it further provides that the listing itself shall not constitute an endorsement.

If an effort is made to strike out that section I shall not oppose it, because I do not believe it would be workable to go to the extreme measure of making a candidate responsible for all committees that spring up and having the committees' expenditures count in his limitation. Furthermore, because I was unalterably opposed to requiring a local committee to file Federal reports, that provision was stricken out.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I appreciate the clarification made by the distinguished Senator from Nebraska.

ORDER FOR ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY NEXT

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President——

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I yield to the acting majority leader to make an announcement. I am sure the Members of the Senate will be interested in it.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, it has come to the attention of the leadership that 15 or 16 Senators have speaking engagements for tomorrow, Friday. After discussing the matter with the distinguished minority leader, the leadership would like to announce that there will be no yea-and-nay votes on any amendments today, and that it is the intention to ask the Senate to be allowed to go over, on the conclusion of its business this afternoon, to Monday at noon.

Mr. DIRKSEN. There is certainly no objection on my part to such a request. I may only add that I have finished my discussion of the subject. I presume other Senators will wish to elaborate on these proposals. Then in due time I shall submit the amendment we have discussed.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business tonight, it adjourn until noon on Monday next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

FEDERAL ELECTIONS ACT OF 1959

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2436) to revise the Federal election laws, to prevent corrupt practices in Federal elections, and for other purposes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I now yield to the distinguished Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I was very much interested in what the distinguished Senator from Illinois said about the proposed law.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, may we have order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I was very much interested in the Senator's observation that the bill, if enacted into law, could very well be construed by the Court as preempting the whole field with which it deals. If that be true—and I think his apprehension is well founded, based upon decisions of the Court in the past—if we enter the field of primary elections and enact any law with regard to the regulation of them and the expense involved, the Court could very well hold that the State laws were obliterated and no longer had any force and effect, but had been nullified because the Federal Government had entered that field. I think there is real warrant for concern about what we are doing if we go into the primary field.

Mr. DIRKSEN. If I may, I should like to say there is also the confusion which develops as a result of traveling on two tracks, with the States traveling on one, and the Federal Government on the other.

If we wish to make short shrift of it, the easy way to do it would be to lift out that section and make it an amendment to the Corrupt Practices Act of 1925. In that way we would bring it within the dimensions of realism. I do not know that it has occasioned any difficulty.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I would point out one thing further. I have not concluded my study of it, but in reading subsection (c) on page 13 of the bill, in section 207, dealing with the exemptions with respect to expenditures by a candidate in a given State, according to my interpretation of that section, there are only about five things for which expenditures could be made within the basic limitation of $50,000. There would be the rent for headquarters. That is not included.

Also excluded are newspaper ads and billboards. I do not know why it is provided that one can print posters and tack them to telephone poles, but not put them on billboards. I do not know the reasoning for that.

Then radio and television. Those are five things. It appears to me that they are expenses which might be incurred, and which are limited to the amount stated for a given State, $50,000, or whatever the total limit is. Within the exemptions, a candidate can do just about everything else, with no limitation.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is correct.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I think that is correct. I am simply wondering, after all, if we pass the bill as it is, even including primaries, just what we will have done. I do not think we will really have accomplished anything toward cleaning up elections or doing anything else. I think there is a gap there through which a team of horses and a wagon could be driven.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. To circumvent the limitations contained in the bill on the amount of money which may be spent, it then would be possible to spend money under State and local committees; and except for the limitation imposed by the State statute, the local committees could proceed to spend at their will.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Any amount, in my judgment.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Then I am correct in believing that if I wanted to avoid the prohibitions contained in the bill, I could have contributions made to local and State committees.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Definitely.

Mr. LAUSCHE. They could proceed to spend without limitation, except when they reached the amount which the State law prohibited.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is correct. There is only one refinement in that connection. There is a provision concerning expenditures which inure to the benefit of a candidate. But as the Senator so well knows, the expenditures spread across a broad field. They include local, county, and State candidates. So how can the expenditures be separated or allocations be made so that it could be said that so much was spent for a Representative and so much for a Senator? It becomes a very bewildering task, to say the least.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I suppose I have as much pride as any other person in being permitted to serve as a Senator of the United States. I have an inordinate pride in the Senate as a legislative body, but that does not blind me to the fact that all the patriotism, all the wisdom, and all the integrity of the country is not confined within the limitations of this Chamber.

I think we ought to leave the legislatures of the several States just a little something to do to occupy their time. Many of our brethren are interested in bringing everything within the scope of Federal law and having everything regulated from Washington, in order that it may bear the stamp of their genius and the impress of their efforts.

The Georgia Legislature is in session at the present time. I served in that body for 10 years. I think that that legislature is wholly capable of regulating the primaries of the political parties within the State of Georgia. They have done so up to now, and we have never had any great scandal in our State as a result of any primary or any general election.

It seems to me we are going very far afield when we try to boil the matter down to minute detail, as some of these provisions do, and to subject to Federal law primaries which heretofore have been regulated altogether by the States. There is not a Member of this body who would have even a vague idea of how many State statutes, which are the result of years of experience and effort on the part of the State legislatures, this amendment would repeal if it were adopted. It would require, perhaps, untold litigation ever to establish just what State laws were stricken down and which ones were not stricken down.

As the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN] has so well stated, the present Supreme Court, if we even indicate that we are going to take a look in any field, will say that we have assumed entire control in that area, to the exclusion of the States.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I particularly raised that question with the legislative counsel this morning. I said that perhaps we ought to include language to determine whether it is the intent of Congress that the Federal Government shall completely preempt or partially preempt this field, so as to make it abundantly clear what we have in mind and how far we intend to go.

Mr. RUSSELL. We have not been able to pass a bill, H.R. 3, which would provide some guidelines or standards in that direction. The Supreme Court, at least until the last two or three judges were added—I think the Supreme Court has been improved over what it was a few years ago—was undertaking to use every possible excuse it could to strike down State laws and to bring everything under Federal control and Federal jurisdiction.

We ought to call a halt somewhere along the line. I believe that if we destroy our dual system of government, this Republic will not too long endure.

I was interested, in listening to the radio this morning, to hear that in Russia Premier Khrushchev proposes, as a result of his visit to the United States, to give at least a little police power to the 16 components—the 16 separate states—of the Soviet Union. He has learned very fast. He came here to get some ideas which would be helpful to him. I am sure that he has not gone far enough; but I commend him for recognizing, even to this extent, the wisdom of having some little activity carried on under local control.

For my part, I am willing to trust the General Assembly of Georgia to control the primaries. They have legislated in that field in the past. I shall not cast a vote here which will say to them that they are incapable of dealing with this subject in the future. I hope the amendment will be rejected.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. THURMOND. I commend the distinguished and able Senator from Illinois and the distinguished and able senior Senator from Georgia for their illuminating remarks on this subject. I wish to associate myself with them. There is no question that if this amendment is adopted, it will result in a further usurpation by the Federal Government of power which belongs to the States.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I can conclude my observations, before the distinguished Senator from Georgia leaves the Chamber, by bringing to the attention of the Senate this one thought: In the office of the Sergeant at Arms, just off the Chamber, hangs a very beautiful portrait. It is a portrait of a distinguished former Senator of the United States from the State of Illinois. He was a great citizen, a great Senator, and a great Democrat. His name was J. Hamilton Lewis.

Mr. RUSSELL. He was born in the State of Georgia, I may say.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is correct, and he was at one time a Representative from the State of Washington.

We lived at the same hotel in Washington for years. I remember, after about my second term in Congress, that we used to meet in the lobby at night. He came one evening, put his arm around my shoulder, and asked, "How is my distinguished leader in the House?" I certainly was not a leader. But we had a good visit about many matters, and the question of Federal-State relationships came into the discussion.

He said, "My boy, I will never live to see it, but you may live to see the day, unless there is great vigilance, when State boundaries will have no significance except to be put on road maps for the convenience and the guidance of tourists."

That statement came from a great Democrat and Senator from my State.

As I watch the unfoldment of Federal power and its deeper thrust into the economic, political, and social life of the country, I shall not vote for the pending amendment, which carries that power only so much further.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield, to permit me to ask a question of the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. If the expenditures in primaries are controlled, will it not establish the principle that the Federal Government may go a step further and determine how primaries shall be conducted, as has been proposed by the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. HENNINGS. The bill has as its basic foundation points or tenets the matters of full disclosure and full reporting, as well as an increased limitation beyond that contained in the present Corrupt Practices Act, as I have said several times before, relating to expenditures.

It has been held in the case of United States against Classic, and in other cases, that the Federal Government does have the authority over primaries with respect to these matters. Certainly in the so-called Taft-Hartley Act this principle has obtained, and has been passed upon by the Congress.

Mr. LAUSCHE. What would be the Senator's answer to the proposal of the Senator from Louisiana, namely, that since this measure would deal with the matter of how primaries shall be conducted and how money shall be spent in that connection, the measure would establish the principle that the Federal Government may completely determine how primaries shall basically be conducted, whether by convention or by direct vote.

Mr. HENNINGS. I think the Senator from Ohio understands that the Corrupt Practices Act of 1925 has already established a precedent relating to the conduct of elections in the States.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is that the answer of the Senator from Missouri to my question?

Mr. HENNINGS. That is the best answer I can give, if I have correctly understood the Senator's question.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I thank the Senator very much.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I shall appreciate it if the attachés of the Senate will advise the distinguished junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] that I am about to answer his remarks. I previously told him that I would, and he said he would be available. He has been necessarily detained in the outer chamber. So I shall appreciate it if he is notified, because he has rather misunderstood the situation in New York State.

The Senator from Louisiana does not like primaries, and apparently there are many other members of his party who do not like primaries. I, myself, do not particularly like primaries. I have never been in a primary contest. Apparently the Senator from Louisiana is inviting me to engage in a primary contest in Louisiana. That I have no desire to do; neither do I think he should be called to New York to engage in a primary contest there. As a matter of fact, we do not have primaries in New York; that is to say, we do not have them in connection with elections to the office of U.S. Senator.

In New York, the way in which we operate—and it is the way in which I was nominated or in which any other candidates for election to the U.S. Senate are nominated—is by a statewide convention of the Republican Party or the Democratic Party, as the case may be. The delegates to that convention are chosen by the Republicans or the Democrats, respectively, throughout the State, to represent them.

The amendment which has been submitted by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS], on behalf of himself and myself, would cover the activities of a nominating convention, just as it would cover matters connected with the primaries in the States in which candidates are chosen through the primary method. Apparently it is that part of the amendment that the Senator from Louisiana has lost sight of, because, in addition to primaries, it covers a convention or a caucus of a political party held for the purpose of nominating candidates.

The important point is to insure that all methods of selecting such nominees are covered; and of course this is particularly important in the case of States in which victory in the primary or in the party caucus or in the party convention is tantamount to election. I assure my friend from Louisiana that that is not true in New York, because, there, nomination definitely is not tantamount to election.

The method of the selection of the junior Senator from New York was the same as it has been for the selection of any other candidate from New York for election to the Senate. It was the same as that for the selection of the candidate on the Democratic ticket, who opposed the junior Senator from New York—although with the important difference that, apparently, in the case of the junior Senator from New York very fortunately there was a rapport, we might say, a community of interest, and enthusiasm, between the candidate for Governor and the candidate for Senator, which apparently did not exist, or did not exist to so great an extent, on the Democratic side. It is possible that that may have had an effect on the result of the election.

But I point this out for the purpose of emphasizing what the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] said—namely, that the amendment which the Senator from Louisiana has offered of course proposes a much more radical interference with States' rights than anything proposed in this bill or in the Hennings amendment to which the Senator from Louisiana has proposed his amendment. It is one thing to regulate that which in its judgment a sovereign State has made a part of its own electoral machinery; it is quite another thing to dictate to the States and to the political parties that a certain procedure must be followed in selecting the candidates for office.

So, Mr. President, I shall vote against the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana to our amendment.

But I differ with the distinguished minority leader [Mr. DIRKSEN] in his position on the amendment in chief. Apparently, Illinois has no laws at all regulating elections. Of course, that is the privilege of the people of Illinois, if they do not wish to have such laws; and, therefore, I can understand the reluctance of the Senator from Illinois to have any such rules or regulations whatever established. It is the natural result of his political experience in a State which does not see fit in any way to regulate such procedures.

But, Mr. President, in this case we are dealing with candidates for election to Federal office. The pending bill is called, in the very bill itself, the Federal Elections Act of 1959, although the press very generally has spoken of it as the clean elections bill. Well, Mr. President, that is a fine name. I have no objection to it, except that it may place too much emphasis on the point that there may be dirt which has to be cleaned up; and I think that is an undue amount of emphasis, because the bill deals with provisions of the election laws and the reporting of the amounts of money spent, even when there is no allegation that anything improper had occurred. It is perfectly proper to contribute to the campaigns of candidates for election to public office, and indeed, we should encourage more active participation by more people in politics.

But if the bill is to be called a clean elections bill, since we are familiar with the expression that cleanliness is next to godliness, the use of such a title for the bill would seem to be incorrect unless we take steps to provide for the elimination of all the dirt which may exist in connection with the elective process. It may be clean and shiny, like a little boy's face; but if we look closely, we may find a little dirt behind the ears or a little telltale gray on the white collar. So, Mr. President, if the pending bill is to be construed as a bill to clean up elections and a clean-elections bill, let us make it clean all the way through. It will not be enough to remove the surface dirt from the shirt or from the political practice. If there is any dirt about it, all the dirt—including the hidden dirt—must be scrubbed out.

The amendment submitted by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS], on behalf of himself and myself, is the cleansing agent that is needed if we are to have a full, complete, clean elections bill.

Finally, I call attention to this fact: It has been argued here that primaries are nothing with which we should concern ourselves. This all happened before my time in the Congress, but it is my understanding that it was the primary contest between our former colleague, Senator Alben Barkley, and former Gov. Happy Chandler, of Kentucky, that gave rise to the writing of the Hatch Act. The allegations on the part of the Chandler forces were that the Barkley forces were using all the Federal employees, and the charges made by the Barkley forces were that the Chandler forces were using all the State employees. I have no knowledge or position about the merit of those charges, but my understanding is that it was those allegations which gave rise, more than any other single factor, to the writing of the Hatch Act, dealing with all Federal elections, along with primaries. Today a Federal employee cannot engage in political activity in a general election or in a primary.

So there is a complete and clear legislative precedent for doing a thorough job here, and not a halfway job.

I hope, therefore, that the amendment of the Senator from Missouri will be adopted.

FEDERAL ELECTIONS ACT OF 1959—AMENDMENTS

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to submit amendments which I propose to offer to the pending bill, S. 2436, on Monday, and have them printed and printed in the RECORD so that they will be at the clerk's desk on Monday next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be received, printed, printed in the RECORD, and will lie on the table.

The amendments intended to be proposed by Mr. GORE are as follows:

On page 14, after line 7, insert the following:

"LIMITATION UPON AMOUNT OF EXPENDITURES BY CANDIDATES FOR ELECTION AS PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT—NATIONAL POLITICAL COMMITTEES

"SEC. 208. Candidates for election as President and Vice President, who are the nominees of a political party, in their campaign for election, shall not make expenditures in excess of an amount equal to the amount obtained by multiplying 10 cents by the largest number of voters casting votes for presidential electors in any one of the last three preceding presidential elections. For the purpose of the limitation prescribed in this section, there shall be included the expenditures made by or on behalf of either or both candidates and there shall be included in the total of expenditures made by such candidates, the expenditures made on their behalf by all national political committees authorized by them to support their candidacy, pursuant to section 212.

"The limitations prescribed in this section shall not include expenditures made by political committees authorized by such candidates to support their candidacy within a State, which shall in each case be subject to the limitations prescribed in section 209.

"LIMITATION UPON AMOUNT OF EXPENDITURES ON BEHALF OF CANDIDATES FOR PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT—STATE POLITICAL COMMITTEES

"SEC. 209. Whenever candidates for President and Vice President have authorized a political committee, within a State, to accept contributions and make expenditures in support of their candidacy, pursuant to section 212, such political committee, together with other political committees within the State, authorized by the candidates and by chairmen of the committees so authorized, shall not make aggregate expenditures in support of such candidates in an amount exceeding the limitation for expenditures that would apply to a candidate for election as a Senator from that State.

"LIMITATION UPON AMOUNT OF EXPENDITURES BY CANDIDATES FOR NOMINATION FOR THE OFFICE OF PRESIDENT OR VICE PRESIDENT—NATIONAL POLITICAL COMMITTEES

"SEC. 210. A candidate for nomination for the office of President or Vice President, in his campaign for such nomination shall not make expenditures in an amount in excess of 50 per centum of the limitation prescribed in section 208.

"For the purpose of the limitation prescribed in this section, there shall be included in the total of expenditures made by a candidate for such nomination the expenditures made on his behalf by all national political committees authorized by him to support his candidacy. No more than 10 per centum of such amount shall be expended from the personal funds of the candidate and/or from the personal funds of the spouse of such candidate.

"The limitations prescribed in this section shall not include expenditures made by political committees authorized by such candidates to support their candidacy within a State, which shall in each case be subject to the limitations prescribed in section 211.

"LIMITATION UPON AMOUNT OF EXPENDITURES ON BEHALF OF CANDIDATES FOR NOMINATION FOR THE OFFICE OF PRESIDENT OR VICE PRESIDENT—STATE POLITICAL COMMITTEES

"SEC. 211. Whenever a candidate for nomination for the office of President or Vice President has authorized a political committee within a State to support his candidacy for such nomination, pursuant to section 212, such political committee, together with other political committees within said State authorized by the chairmen thereof, shall not make expenditures on behalf of such candidates in excess of the limitation that would apply to a candidate for the office of Senator from such State.

"AUTHORIZATION OF POLITICAL COMMITTEES

"SEC. 212. (a) Candidates for election as President and Vice President seeking election as nominees of a political party may jointly authorize in writing one or more national political committees to support their candidacy. Such authorization shall be addressed to the chairman of the authorized political committee and a copy of such authorization shall be filed by the candidate with the Comptroller General. Such candidates for election as President and Vice President may also jointly authorize in writing not more than two political committees within each State to support their candidacy, and may further authorize the chairmen of such political committees, as their political agents, to authorize other political committees within that State to support their candidacy. Copies of all such authorizations shall be filed with the Comptroller General as above provided.

"(b) A candidate for nomination for the office of President or Vice President may authorize one or more national political committees to support his candidacy in the same manner as provided in subsection (a). Such a candidate for nomination for the office of President or Vice President may also authorize in writing not more than two political committees within each State to support his candidacy, and may further authorize the chairmen of such political committees, as his political agents, to authorize other political committees within that State to support his candidacy. Copies of all authorizations shall be filed with the Comptroller General as above provided.

"(c) Whenever a candidate authorizes a political committee to support his candidacy for nomination or election, he shall specify the maximum amount of expenditures such committee may make in his behalf. Any such authorization may be modified from time to time by filing an amended authorization, to be filed in the same manner as prescribed for original authorizations: Provided, That the amount specified in any amended authorization shall not be less than the expenditures made on behalf of such candidate by such committee prior to the time at which the amended authorization is effective.

"(d) No political committee shall make expenditures for or on behalf of a candidate in excess of the amount specified in the written authorization to such committee last filed by such candidate.

"REPORTS BY CANDIDATES FOR ELECTION AS PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT

"SEC. 213. (a) Candidates for election as President and Vice President who are nominees of a political party shall jointly file reports of receipts and expenditures with the Comptroller General, on forms to be prescribed by him. Such reports shall be complete as of the thirtieth and tenth days next preceding the date on which an election for the offices for which they are candidates is to be held, and as of the twentieth day following such election, and in each instance shall be filed not later than the fourth day following the reporting date. Such reports shall contain—

"(1) a correct and itemized detailed report of contributions received and expenditures made by or for them in aid or support of their candidacy for election, or for the purpose of influencing the result of the election, in the same manner as required of the treasurer of a political committee by section 202, including amounts expended from their own funds and total amounts received and expended by committees authorized by them pursuant to section 212 to support his candidacy;

"(2) a list of the names and addresses of each political committee they have authorized to support their candidacy; and

"(3) a statement of every promise or pledge made by them or by any person for them with their consent, prior to the closing of the polls on the day of election, relative to the appointment or recommendation for appointment of any person to any public or private position or employment for the purpose of procuring support of their candidacy, and the name, address and occupation of every person to whom any such promise or pledge has been made, together with the description of any such position. If no such promise or pledge has been made, that fact shall be specifically stated.

"(b) The reports required to be filed by subdivision (a) (1) shall be cumulative, but where there has been no change in an item reported in a previous report, only the amount need be carried forward.

"(c) Candidates shall enclose with their first report a statement, based upon the records of the proper officials, giving the total number of votes cast for all candidates for the offices of President and Vice President, at the prior election used as a basis for the computation made under subsection 207(b).

"(d) Candidates for nomination for the office of President or Vice President shall file reports of receipts and expenditures with the Comptroller General, on forms to be prescribed by him. Such reports shall be complete as of the corresponding dates, shall be filed within the same time limitations, and shall contain the same information as that prescribed in subsection (a), (b), and (c) of this section.

"Renumber section 208 through section 212 to read section 214 through section 218, respectively."

Strike out all after line 3, page 17, through line 18, page 18, and substitute the following:

"LIMITATIONS ON FINANCIAL AID

"SEC. 302. Section 608 of title 18 of the United States Code is amended to read as follows:

"'(a) It is unlawful for any person, other than a political committee, to make, directly or indirectly, contributions to or on behalf of, or expenditures on behalf of, candidates and/or political committees, in a total aggregate amount in excess of $5,000 during any calendar year;

"'(b) It is unlawful for any person other than a political committee to make contributions or expenditures in excess of a total aggregate amount of $250 in any calendar year to or on behalf of any candidate or candidates for the Senate or the House of Representatives seeking election in any State or States other than the State in which such contributor has his legal residence;

"'(c) It is unlawful for any political committee, other than a national political committee, to make, directly or indirectly, contributions to or on behalf of, or expenditures on behalf of, candidates and/or political committees in any State or States other than the State wherein said political committee maintains its office, and it is unlawful for any candidate or political committee to accept or receive any contribution or to authorize or permit an expenditure prohibited by this section: Provided, however, That nothing in this title or in the Federal Elections Act of 1959 shall be construed to prohibit any political committee from transferring funds in any amount to a national political committee, up to the maximum limitations placed upon such national political committee;

"'(d) It is unlawful for a national political committee to make contributions to or on behalf of, and/or expenditures on behalf of, candidates, and/or their authorized committees, for the Senate or the House of Representatives, in excess of the following sums in any calendar year:

"'(1) $10,000 in the case of a candidate for Senator, and

"'(2) $3,000 in the case of a candidate for Representative, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner:

"'(e) It is unlawful for a candidate for Senator or Representative in, or Delegate or Resident Commissioner to, the Congress of the United States, to receive contributions from and/or authorize expenditures by national political committees aggregating in excess of the following:

"'(1) $10,000 in the case of a candidate for Senator, or

"'(2) $3,000 in the case of a candidate for Representative, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner.

For the purpose of the limitations prescribed in this subsection, there shall be included in the aggregate contributions received by a candidate all contributions on behalf of such candidate made by national political committees to all political committees authorized by such candidate to support his candidacy;

"'(f) It is unlawful for any person to purchase or buy any goods, commodities, advertising or articles of any kind or description, the proceeds of which, or any portion thereof, directly or indirectly inures to the benefit of or for any candidate or any political committee: Provided, however, That this subsection shall not apply to the purchase and sale by candidates and committees of campaign pins, buttons, and similar materials for prices not exceeding $5 per article.

"'This subsection shall not interfere with the usual and known business, trade, or profession of any candidate.

"'(g) In all cases of violations of this section by any person other than an individual, any officer, director, or managing head thereof who consents to such violation, shall be punished as herein provided.

"'(h) Whoever violates any provision of this section shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.'"

Strike all after line 14, page 5, through line 6, page 8, and substitute the following:

"REPORTS BY POLITICAL COMMITTEES

"SEC. 202. (a) The treasurer of a political committee shall file reports of receipts and expenditures with the Comptroller General, on forms to be prescribed by him, and shall transmit a copy of such reports to the clerk of the United States district court for the district in which the principal office of the committee is located. Such reports shall be filed, complete as of June 30 and December 31 of each year, and as of the thirtieth and tenth days next preceding the date on which an election is to be held, and as of the twentieth day following an election, with respect to which contributions were received or expenditures made by such committee. In each instance reports shall be filed not later than the fourth day following the reporting date as above provided. Each report shall contain—

"(1) amount of cash on hand at the beginning of the reporting period;

"(2) the name and address of each person who has made a contribution to or for such committee in one or more items of the aggregate amount or value, within the calendar year, of $500 or more, together with the amount and date of such contribution, with the names of the contributors arranged alphabetically;

"(3) the total sum of individual contributions made to or for such committee during the calendar year and not stated under paragraph (2);

"(4) the name and address of each political committee or candidate from which the committee received any transfer of funds, together with the amounts and dates of all such transfers;

"(5) the total sum of all contributions made to or for such committee during the calendar year;

"(6) the name and address of each person to whom an expenditure has been made by such committee in one or more items of the aggregate amount or value, within the calendar year, of $100 or more, and the amount, date, and purpose of such expenditure;

"(7) the total sum of all expenditures made by such committee, during the calendar year and not stated under paragraph (6);

"(8) the name and address of each political committee or candidate to which the committee made any transfer of funds, together with the amounts and dates of all such transfers;

"(9) the total sum of expenditures made by such committee during the calendar year.

"(b)(1) Each item of expenditure shall be described in sufficient detail to identify it accurately, including, in the case of printed cards, pamphlets, circulars, posters, dodgers, booklets, or other such advertisements, writings or other statements (such as reprints from periodicals, books, newspapers, or other publications), the title and number of each; in the case of newspaper advertisements, the names of the newspapers; and in the case of radio and television items, the names of the stations.

"(2) Each expenditure shall also be described by general category, including (i) personal services and reimbursed expenses (salaries, commissions, fees, traveling, and subsistence); (ii) printing, purchase, and distribution of literature; (iii) newspaper, periodical, and billboard advertising; (iv) radio; (v) television; (vi) office overhead; (vii) election day expenses; (viii) transfer to other political committees and contributions to candidates; and (ix) miscellaneous; and the total expenditure for such category shall be listed.

"(c) The reports required to be filed by subdivision (a) shall be cumulative during the calendar year to which they relate, but where there has been no change in an item reported in a previous report only the amount need be carried forward.

"(d) The report required to be filed as of December 31 shall cover the entire calendar year.

"(e) The reports required to be filed by subdivision (a) of this section shall also contain a list of the names of candidates in whose behalf contributions were received or expenditures made, listing separately those candidates who have authorized the committee to support their candidacy. In the case of committees supporting more than one candidate (including State and local candidates) the amount of expenditures allocable to each candidate as computed under subsection 203(c) shall be stated."

AMENDMENT OF LIBRARY SERVICES ACT

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, Senator AIKEN, Senator MURRAY, Senator EASTLAND, Senator JORDAN, Senator GRUENING, Senator YARBOROUGH, Senator RANDOLPH, Senator MORSE, Senator WILLIAMS of New Jersey, Senator MCNAMARA, Senator CLARK, Senator JACKSON, Senator KENNEDY, Senator KEFAUVER, Senator DOUGLAS, Senator FULBRIGHT, Senator HART, Senator LONG of Louisiana, Senator SPARKMAN, Senator SYMINGTON, Senator MANSFIELD, Senator GREEN, Senator HENNINGS, Senator CHAVEZ, Senator MCCARTHY, Senator HUMPHREY, Senator BYRD of West Virginia, Senator CARROLL, Senator ENGLE, Senator CANNON, Senator COOPER, Senator LONG of Hawaii, Senator MAGNUSON, Senator JOHNSTON of South Carolina, Senator MONRONEY, Senator JAVITS, Senator PROUTY, Senator YOUNG of Ohio, Senator BUSH, Senator MUNDT, Senator BIBLE, Senator MCGEE, Senator MOSS, Senator BARTLETT, Senator BENNETT, Senator PASTORE, Senator DODD, Senator KUCHEL, and Senator CHURCH, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend the Library Services Act in order to extend for 5 years the authorization for appropriations, and for other purposes.

The Library Services Act, which I introduced in the 84th Congress and which became law on June 19, 1956, has for its purpose the development of public library services in rural areas by providing funds for a grant-in-aid program to stimulate the States to develop methods of providing library services to residents of small towns, villages, and farming communities which now totally lack them, or where they are inadequately supplied.

The act authorizes an appropriation of $7,500,000 annually for 5 years for grants to the States for the extension and improvement of rural public library service.

Rural area is defined as any place of 10,000 population or less, according to latest U.S. census. However, funds may be utilized by urban libraries to extend service to rural areas.

The State library extension agency in each State prepares and submits to the U.S. Commissioner of Education a plan, which will, in its judgment, assure the use of the funds to maximum advantage.

Funds under a State plan may be used for salaries, books, and other library materials, library equipment, and other operating expenses, but not for the erection of buildings or purchase of land.

Funds are allotted to the States on the basis of their rural population and are matched by the States on the basis of their per capita income.

To remain eligible for a Federal grant, a State must maintain its expenditures for all public library service at least at the same level as in fiscal 1956; and State and local expenditures for rural public library service must not fall below the 1956 level.

The program provided for in this legislation has accomplished much to assist our people in small towns and rural areas.

Thirty million rural people now have new or improved public library services available to them as a result of this cooperative State-local-Federal program.

County and regional library developments have brought public library service for the first time to over 1 million rural children and adults, and substantially improved service to 7.6 million more.

Over 280 separate project activities to extend and develop rural public library service were included in the 50 State plans for 1959.

State appropriations for public library service to rural areas have increased 54 percent since 1956.

Local appropriations for public libraries in rural areas under State plans have increased 45 percent since State and Federal funds were available for stimulation and development.

Approximately 200 new bookmobiles are traveling rural roads, bringing books and information to people in remote areas.

More than 5 million books and other informational and educational materials have been added to the cultural resources of rural communities.

State library extension agencies have been able to strengthen their staffs and resources to assist rural communities in improving their library services or establish new services. Some 90 field consultants were added to State agency staffs, an increase of 80 percent over total field staff in 1956.

Increases in library usage as a result of library development projects are impressive. Many county and regional library projects report increases in book circulation of 40 percent and up, following the availability of more good books, more staff, bookmobiles, and added library branches and stations.

In spite of the tremendous gains made in the extension of library services where they did not exist in the past, there is a great need for the extension of this legislation.

By the end of fiscal 1961, when this program will expire, there will still be millions of rural children and adults who have not had the opportunity to benefit from library demonstration or development programs under the Library Services Act. It is estimated that only half of the job will be done, that at least 40 million rural residents will still have no public library service, or inadequate service, and that 150 rural counties will still have no public library service within their borders.

Among other reasons for extending the program for an additional 5 years is the fact that the program has not, due to a number of factors, been completely operative for all of the years authorized by the legislation.

Much preparatory time was needed in getting the program under way. For example, regulations were not completed until December of 1956. State library extension agencies found it difficult to staff the library development program because of a serious shortage of trained librarians. In many States time was needed for necessary State legislation and for appropriation of matching funds. In some cases States have not been able until recently to use all of the money which has been made available, so that the program has not been carried on at the level anticipated when the act was passed. Other States could, of course, have used the full appropriation, had the money been made available.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to include at this point in my remarks the following table, which shows the action of the Congress in consistently granting more money than has been requested by the Bureau of the Budget for this program. Even with the increased appropriations, however, the full amount has never been appropriated.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Fiscal year	Budget estimate	House allowance	Senate allowance	Appropriation
1957	$7,500,000	(1)	$7,500,000	$2,050,000
1958	3,000,000	$5,000,000	[2] 5,000,000	5,000,000
1959	3,000,000	5,000,000	6,000,000	6,000,000
1960	5,150,000	6,000,000	7,500,000	[3] 6,000,000

[1] House did not consider request; late supplemental submitted to Senate.
[2] Senate added for first time reallotment provision; accepted by House conferees.
[3] While Senate increase was not accepted, we won an allotment based on authorization—just as good—a supplemental of $130,000 is proposed for later submission.
[4] Estimate proposes continuation of allotment of full authorization.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to include in the RECORD at this point in my remarks excerpts from an article appearing in the January 1960 issue of the "American Library Association Bulletin." This material was prepared by Mr. John G. Lorenz, Director, Library Services Branch, U.S. Office of Education, and indicates in summary form the extent to which the various States and territories have benefited during the first 3 years of this program.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Alabama: Four new regional libraries were developed: Wheeler Basin, Choctawhatchee, Coosa Valley, and Carl Elliot regions. Cross Trails region was formed by merger of Covington-Crenshaw and Coffee-Geneva regional libraries; and the Horseshoe Bend Regional Library, by adding two counties to the former Lee-Tallapoosa region. The State staff was strengthened by the addition of 2 field workers and 10 other professional librarians, some of whom are in project libraries. Two regions held in-service training programs. State funds for rural library service increased approximately 50 percent between 1956 and 1959.

Alaska: A major reason for the organization of the first Territorial Department of Library Service in 1955 was to provide Alaska with an agency which could administer the Library Services Act. The Federal program assisted the new agency to add to its small staff and build its book collection. Field trips were made by the agency head to remote areas to develop small community libraries and establish book stations to which books could be mailed from Juneau. Financial grants were made to assist local public libraries. Ten new community libraries were established. In 1959, under statehood, the territorial department became a division of the State education department.

Arizona: As a result of the Federal program, the Department of Library and Archives received its first State appropriation to establish a new library extension division. Most of the State and Federal funds have been assigned to building a book collection for statewide loan and reference service. Direct bookmobile and consultant service is also being given, statewide, to the limit of equipment and staff available. A cooperative library development project between Yuma city and county has been organized.

Arkansas: Five new regional libraries were developed: Arkansas Valley, Garland-Montgomery, Mississippi-Crittenden, White-Woodruff, and Hempstead-Nevada. Three regions were enlarged and the Southwest Regional Library developed its first bookmobile service. By 1959, the State agency and State grant budgets had both increased by approximately 30 percent over 1956. State funds are now totally supporting four new positions added to the State library agency to carry out the Library Services Act program.

California: The State library strengthened extension services by adding two field consultants and other staff and by purchasing an exhibit bookmobile. A processing center was established at the State library to serve 16 member libraries. Three demonstrations of improved library service were successful. Butte County voted to support bookmobile service. Amador County voted to continue cooperation with San Joaquin County for processing and improved reference and loan services. Lassen and Plumas-Sierra County libraries are coordinating their services under one head librarian. Santa Barbara County, however, did not vote funds for added reference and advisory services.

Colorado: Four field libraries have been added by the State library to work with four regions of the State. A seven-county demonstration in the lower Arkansas Valley was organized with bookmobile service. A similar five-county demonstration has been started in northeastern Colorado, and a single one-county deposit demonstration was established in a mountain county. The State library appropriation increased 17 percent in 1959 over the previous year and local funds in the areas of the State plan increased 10 percent.

Connecticut: A central processing unit and a central book collection were organized in newly rented quarters. Two added field consultants were employed to provide an expanded consultant service in the eastern and western areas of the State. Workshops have been held on public relations, storytelling, and cataloging; and assistance has been given to the State library association in planning a workshop for trustees.

Florida: The State library's extension services have been strengthened by the addition of two public library consultants and by added clerical staff. Increased book purchases have resulted in a 32 percent increase in interlibrary loans. The State library has sponsored two workshops with Florida State University, and one workshop with the State library association. The first regional libraries in Florida were established—Suwannee and St. Lucie-Okeechobee. Two new county libraries were established—Collier and Alachua (by contract with the Gainesville Public Library). Rural library service in Orange, Leon, and Martin Counties was improved.

Georgia: Two new regional libraries were established and eight single county libraries joined other regional systems. Six regional libraries expanded or improved rural service, and 31 improved their reference collections and service through special grants. Seventeen professional staff members were added throughout the regional systems. A study course for library trustees was developed and is being offered through the university's center for continuing education. State and local funds each show an increase of approximately $300,000 between 1956 and 1959.

Guam: The territorial library has been strengthened with the addition of two staff members and an enlargement of the book collection. One staff member has secured professional training. Station collections have been improved and enlarged and a station wagon purchased for deliveries. Arrangements are under way to move the headquarters library in the fall of 1959 to larger quarters.

Hawaii: All rural residents have benefited by strengthening of services from the county libraries of Hawaii, Kauai, and Maui, and from the Library of Hawaii. A bookmobile for adult services has been added, two professional librarians and other staff hired. Science, juvenile and young people's book collections have been strengthened. Arrangements for a professional survey of Hawaii libraries, both public and school, have been completed.

Idaho: Services of the State library have been strengthened by hiring the first trained administrator and by the addition of three more professional librarians. Twice as many books were purchased in the 1957–59 biennium as in the previous 14 years. Six new library districts, five being countywide, were organized as the result of elections. Grants were made to seven district libraries to extend and improve services. The 1957 legislature tripled the biennial appropriation for the State library and increased it further in 1959.

Illinois: Warren County assisted neighboring Henderson County, which had no library, to establish countywide service. Result, a successful vote in Henderson and continuing cooperation between the two counties. The southern Illinois regional library service was made a permanent State regional branch serving 34 counties. Other regional library systems, demonstrated with aid of LSA funds, are Illinois Valley, Prairie Trails, Savanna, and Kaskaskia. Institutes, workshops, and other in-service training meetings were held in area of cataloging, children's work, reference, and cooperative practices. Two annual statewide trustee workshops have been held. State library appropriation has been substantially increased.

Iowa: Major projects were improving book collection and physical facilities of traveling library commission. Contracts were entered into by the State agency with Cherokee, Mason City, Cedar Falls, and Jefferson City to do fieldwork in specific geographical areas of the State. Grants of reference books and special advisory services were made to 87 libraries meeting State standards. Other State agency level highlights are: Increase in travel funds for consultant staff; improvement of book, recording, and library films collection for interlibrary loan service. Leadership training workshops and district meetings were held on improved library planning, public relations, and cooperative projects. Assistance was given to 70 public libraries in improving collections and services.

Kansas: In 1956 the traveling libraries commission had one trained librarian on its staff. Two field librarians and two clerks have been added and larger quarters provided and equipped. Two exhibit bookmobiles have been purchased and a western Kansas extension office was opened in the college library at Hays. Countywide studies were started and the Stevens County report was completed. Regional workshops were held for trustees and others were sponsored for librarians.

Kentucky: Six regional libraries, Kentucky's first, are being developed and include 34 counties. The State staff has been strengthened by addition of three fieldworkers and six other professional librarians working either in the State agency or in the regional systems. The State agency employed a library consultant for a limited period to work with the State legislative reference commission in its survey of the State agency and public library service, including the library laws. The biennial appropriation for the State agency has been increased by $50,000.

Louisiana: The State has accelerated its demonstration program. Five were undertaken in the period 1956–59; Allen, St. Bernard, and Vernon have been successfully completed and two are still under way. A bookmobile service demonstration was successfully completed in Caddo parish with an appropriation of $56,000 before the end of the demonstration period. Ten professional librarians have been added in the demonstrations. A film describing the Louisiana demonstration program and showing the value of library service to Louisiana citizens is in production. It is designed for use on television as well as for group meetings.

Maine: Interstate cooperation was initiated on a film circuit project with New Hampshire and Vermont, as well as cooperation with all other New England States on a film about library development in the New England region. Professional consultants and a specialist in children's work were added to staff; State book collection was expanded and improved; a statewide newsletter and other professional materials were distributed to libraries; and State agency headquarters were improved. Three bookmobiles are giving direct service in designated geographical areas of the State.

Maryland: Two new county libraries, Calvert and Carroll, were established and 13 county libraries improved service. In these counties, 39 percent of the special grants were spent for books; 34 percent for additional staff; 21 percent for bookmobiles, and 6 percent for other equipment. Three counties contracted for technical processing service. Informal cooperative agreements have been developed in several other counties, including exchanges of materials and extension of reciprocal borrowing privileges.

Massachusetts: A fourth State regional library center, in the northeast, was established with personnel, books, bookmobile, and quarters. Services of the other three centers were expanded. A statewide newsletter has been started and an intensive in-service training program conducted in library administration, as well as in cooperative practices. Forty-two surveys of public libraries were made, and an audio-visual center was set up in one of the regions.

Michigan: State agency consultant staff increased, and collection of books for public library development programs was enlarged. Stimulation programs and bookmobile demonstrations in several areas of the State were used to develop new or better library services. First phase of the statewide study by State library staff was completed. Oakland County study was completed and cooperative programs in north Oakland begun. Twelve community libraries in six northwestern counties are receiving books and technical assistance.

Minnesota: The Library Services Act stimulated the enactment of the first State grant program for public libraries. The State agency has been strengthened by the addition of a field worker, clerical staff, and two demonstration bookmobiles film service, and publication and inservice training programs have been expanded. Five new regional libraries serving five counties and two new county libraries have been established. Library service is available for first time to 68,000 rural residents and improved service to 269,000.

Mississippi: Two new regional libraries were established; one county library extended service to an adjoining county by contract; one established regional library added another county, another increased its tax millage, and a third doubled its book budget. One new county system was established. The State agency has been strengthened by addition of six professional staff members (including four field librarians), and by increased book and essential equipment purchases. A statewide conference on book selection resulted in improved book resources in local libraries. Forty-two counties strengthened services through larger book collections, improvement of physical facilities, and addition of bookmobiles and branches.

Missouri: Three regional libraries of three counties each have been established. Four independent town libraries have merged with their respective county libraries, resulting in strengthened services for all. Two years of a three-year series of inservice training institutes have been completed. The addition of two field librarians and one other professional librarian has resulted in closer relationship between the State and local libraries. New teletype service from the State library has increased interlibrary loan transactions by 4,000 in 1 year. The State agency produced a kinescope for TV and local library usage and a sound and color filmstrip entitled "Building Your Regional Library." Ten scholarships of $2,000 each have been awarded. Two recipients have completed their courses and are at work in rural Missouri libraries.

Montana: Two federations of libraries were organized—the northwest federation serving 2 counties with 4 libraries, and the Five Valley federation serving 7 counties with 7 libraries and 13 branches. Bookmobile service and centralized ordering, cataloging, and processing are provided. A statewide film circuit has been established with the Great Falls Public Library as the center. The State Library Extension Commission has been strengthened with the addition of two professional librarians and clerical staff. The agency has moved to larger quarters.

Nebraska: The south central regional library was established to serve Harlan, Phelps, Franklin, and part of Kearney Counties. Bookmobile service has been extended and film services started. Bookmobile service has also been established by the Rock County Library, and the service is extended to Loup and Keya Paha Counties. The public library commission has employed a consultant to supervise projects under the program. The first statewide meeting of trustees was held as a Governor's conference.

Nevada: A survey of public service in the State was made by a special consultant; the report recommended centralized cataloging, the use of bookmobiles, and the formation of three regional centers to be supported through cooperative financing. Two bookmobiles were demonstrated statewide as part of a library promotion project, directed by a special consultant. Centralized cataloging has been started at the State library for six county libraries. Grants have been made to eight county libraries for improving services such as lengthening hours of service and adding to the book collection. The State library has opened a branch office in Las Vegas.

New Hampshire: A new branch of the State library has been established and other branches strengthened. Four new bookmobiles have been assigned to State branches, 2 field consultants added to the State staff, and 80 workshops held. At the State library, a 15-percent increase in book stock increased interlibrary loans 47 percent. A unique statewide public relations program by a professional firm has increased library awareness and local library support substantially.

New Jersey: A State agency tricounty library service center has been set up in southern New Jersey with a staff of six and a bookmobile to serve Cumberland, Gloucester, and Salem Counties. Book loans exceeded 113,000 in less than 1½ years. Staff was added at the State agency for more extensive field work; new automotive and office equipment was purchased to handle demands from the field; lists of new books purchased by the State agency were distributed to all libraries; and regional institutes, clinics, and workshops, and a statewide 2-day trustee workshop were held.

New Mexico: Four regional branches of the State library have been established, serving 21 of the State's 32 counties. Each region has a bookmobile, station wagon, and professional and clerical staff. Centralized cataloging for the regions has been started. Personnel have been added at the State library commission to handle special requests and reference questions. A workshop for trustees has been held.

New York: Seven field advisory positions were added, including specialists in young adult, reference, and children's services. A demonstration bookmobile was used in development of library systems. Other significant developments: a communication network by telephone and teletypewriter among local and regional libraries and State library; a substantial scholarship program; 51 regional workshops particularly in reference and children's library work; six film circuits, and a central collection of recordings developed.

North Carolina: A regional library, Northwestern, was formed by Allegheny, Stokes, and Surry counties; and a county library, Brunswick, was established. Rural library service improved in 82 of the State's 100 counties under plans submitted by 64 counties and 8 regional library systems. Fifty of the plans called for additional book and staff resources, and 32 called for extended bookmobile service. One field librarian and three other professional librarians, including a specialist in adult services, have been added to the State staff. Reference and interlibrary loan services of the State library were strengthened and teletype connection set up with the interlibrary center at the university.

North Dakota: Three regional libraries have been organized, and four bookmobiles serve six counties. Another bookmobile, purchased with federated women's club funds, is used on exhibit. A 1957 law enabled establishment of county libraries if 51 percent of the voters sign petitions. A county tax levy is made when the library is voted and State funds are granted until local tax collections are made.

Ohio: Annual book purchases for State agency were tripled. The State library provides bookmobile service to two bicounty systems. Demonstrations of improved service to Wood and Hardin Counties were successfully completed. Bookmobile grants were made to five counties; centralized processing center for 12 libraries in eastern Ohio was established; and a series of workshops on selection and reference work were held.

Oklahoma: One of the first two regional library demonstrations was successfully completed with establishment of the Cleveland-Garvin-McClain Multi-County Library. Although the Osage-Pawnee multicounty demonstration failed to secure continuing local appropriations, the existing local libraries were strengthened and received larger local appropriations. The State's library extension division program has been greatly strengthened through addition of two field librarians and four other professional librarians, including an adult services specialist. Additional books and equipment, and an exhibit bookmobile have also contributed to the library development program.

Oregon: The first State grant program for public libraries was established in 1957 to match Federal funds, and grants have been made to nine counties. Three multicounty demonstrations have been started, five bookmobiles purchased and three field consultants employed. Centralized cataloging has been started in Clackamas County and in the north coastal region. Trustees and Jaycees have helped to carry on an active library promotion program.

Pennsylvania: State agency increased its professional staff, improved its book collection, and reorganized its administrative structure. An extensive workshop and field visit program was carried out and a statewide conference for library trustees held. A survey of present and potential library service was made, which led to the creation of a Governor's commission on public library development, to implement the recommendations of the survey.

Puerto Rico: The Commonwealth's established program for extension of service through community libraries, bookmobile service, libraries in rural housing projects, and traveling libraries for rural barrios has been greatly strengthened with added materials and clerical staff to help in processing these materials. With the arrival of the eighth bookmobile in the Commonwealth, 65 new community stops have been added. Seventy-seven traveling library collections and nine housing project libraries have also been added to the service. Information about the public library program has been widely distributed through TV and radio programs, newspapers, educational publications, and library exhibits.

Rhode Island: A special unit of the secretary of state's office, public library services in rural areas, was organized to administer the LSA program. A director, assistant director, clerical staff, and a bookmobile were added and new quarters were obtained. A book grant to rural libraries program, stressing reference materials was initiated. Books are ordered and processed by the State agency. A series of workshops have been held at headquarters. State consultant and bookmobile service has steadily increased.

South Carolina: A new regional library has been legally established by Aiken, Barnwell, and Edgefield Counties. The independent libraries of Anderson County merged to establish a county system. As special projects, 10 county library systems received grants of $2,500 each for improved reference materials and services, and 6 library systems participated in the personnel project grants for the employment of intern trainees under a work-study program. Improved reference materials at the State library resulted in a 1,000-percent increase in interlibrary loan requests filled. Expansion and strengthening of the State agency services have been aided by the addition of a field librarian and two other professional librarians, including a reference services specialist.

South Dakota: Two regional libraries have been organized and preliminary work has been started for the third. In the northwest regional library, Butte and Harding Counties have voted support, and in the northeastern part of the State, Brown County has also voted county library support. Centralized cataloging and processing is provided by the State library for the regional libraries, and bookmobiles have been placed in service. The State agency moved to larger quarters.

Tennessee: A new regional library service center was established. A 2-year demonstration of service to seven counties successfully ended when each county formally affiliated with the regional center conducting the demonstration. Improvement of rural library service was undertaken by three metropolitan library systems through contract with the State library. Ten professional librarians have been added in the statewide program. An added State fieldworker has enabled the State library to organize its first statewide trustee institute and the first statewide meeting of all regional service center personnel. The State library's appropriation for public library service was increased by $50,000 a year. The legislature passed an act providing for a study by the State legislative council of the State's public library program.

Texas: A special staff of 10 (including a director, 2 regional supervisors, and project and bookmobile librarians) was added for rural library service, to work in close cooperation with the extension division. The program of 1-year multicounty bookmobile demonstrations is moving ahead and bringing the first public library service to many areas, as well as encouraging greater cooperation among existing public libraries. The first regional library demonstration is now underway in the coastal bend area centering around Corpus Christi. Nine workshops on better library practices have been held in regional locations and the first statewide trustees institute was held in 1959.

Utah: The legislature established its State library in 1957 and organization of the agency was the primary activity in the first year. Four bookmobiles have been purchased. Demonstrations are being provided to nine counties in two regions with the use of two bookmobiles. The State library appropriation for 1960–61 was increased from $100,000 to $125,000, and the support for local libraries has also shown a marked increase.

Vermont: Five new bookmobiles, nine added staff members, and more books and library equipment have materially strengthened the State's program and its regional centers. More field visits and workshop programs have been accomplished and cooperative programs between libraries have increased. Vermont is cooperating with New Hampshire on a joint publication, "North Country Libraries."

Virginia: The regional demonstration program in the State has been strengthened with books, equipment, and personnel. The Eastern Shore regional demonstration has been successfully completed and a demonstration is now underway in Wise County (a city-county region). Already established county and regional libraries have received funds to strengthen their programs through books, personnel, and equipment, including new bookmobiles and extended bookmobile schedules. The State library extension division has been strengthened by the addition of staff, and materials and equipment to improve their consultant work with the local libraries. Under the scholarship program, six scholarships have been awarded.

Virgin Islands: The islands' centralized library service has been strengthened through a great increase in materials and by staff to process them. Many new library service outlets have been opened. St. Johns Island has its first permanent library branch, and traveling library service to other points of the island. St. Croix Island has the first bookmobile in the islands as well as materials and equipment to improve the libraries in towns of Christiansted and Fredericksted. The central library of St. Thomas is now open more hours, and has improved its book collection. The legislature has appropriated $12,500 in added funds for rural library extension in the past 2 years.

Washington: The Columbia River Regional Library was established to serve Chelan, Douglas, Ferry, Grant, and Okanagan Counties, which cover an area of 15,000 square miles. A bookmobile operates from the headquarters at Wenatchee, and another from each of the subcenters at Omak and Moses Lake. Staff specialists have been employed for the major services and 56,000 books have been added to the region. Recordings and films are also available. Book catalogs for all libraries in the region have been provided. A color film, "Yours for the Asking," on regional library service was prepared by the State library.

West Virginia: The State commission initiated centralized book ordering and processing for its regional program, and expanded its staff and public relations activities. New quarters for agency were acquired; three bookmobiles were purchased; and a film on library use and development was produced. One demonstration, in Harrison-Upshur Counties, was successful; and another was started in Marshall County. Reference collections of 16 libraries were strengthened, and training in use of reference materials was given.

Wisconsin: Eight staff members were added to increase services; and book collection was increased to improve reference and loan work, in response to local library requests. A more intensive workshop program was undertaken, and a statewide trustee conference was called by the Governor. Demonstration bookmobiles have been used in several counties and regions. The Milwaukee Public Library received a grant for extension of its services to rural areas around Milwaukee via bookmobile. A library processing center was set up for 18 libraries in a 5-county area. Scholarship funds for library training have been made available and a grant was made to the University of Wisconsin for a statewide library study.

Two more States in the fourth year—Delaware and Wyoming—submitted State plans for fiscal 1960 which were approved and are now in effect, bringing the total number of States and territories participating to 52. Allotments for the fourth year are on the basis of the maximum authorized appropriation, $7.5 million.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, in my own State of Alabama the Library Services Act has been of great benefit.

It has resulted in a local, State, and Federal effort which has provided new or improved library services for 707,705 people; increased State appropriations for library services from $108,100 to $179,695; increased local support for library services from $1,097,813 to more than $1,595,156; increased statewide support for library service from 36 cents per capita to 52 cents per capita.

Mr. President, it has also resulted in the establishment or expansion of the following regional libraries: Coosa Valley Regional Library; Horseshoe Bend Regional Library; Wheeler Basin Regional Library; Choctawhatchee Regional Library; Cross Trails Regional Library, and Carl Elliott Regional Library. New bookmobiles have been provided for Coosa Valley Regional Library; Coffee-Geneva Regional Library; Wheeler Basin Regional Library; Choctawhatchee Regional Library; Walker County Library; Horseshoe Bend Regional Library.

In spite of all this progress for Alabama, there is still a great need for assistance in this area.

Alabama still has 6 counties without free public library service; 33 counties without effective means of serving entire population; at least 20 counties with significant plans for improved library service, such as, further regional library development and expansion; and 3 counties giving bookmobile service without a trained librarian.

Mr. President, I am sure that if the Congress will approve the extension of this program, Alabama and all other States will use library service funds to good advantage to promote and crystallize local incentive, and to develop and strengthen library services throughout the States.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point in my remarks a table showing the Federal payment to States under the Library Services Act for each of the 4 years in which the program has been in operation. This table was prepared by the Library Services Branch of the U.S. Office of Education.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 2830) to amend the Library Services Act in order to extend for 5 years the authorization for appropriations, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. HILL (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

ENCOURAGING EDUCATION AND STRENGTHENING THE STATES

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, debate about Federal aid for education has swirled over the land for more than a decade.

Presidential message after Presidential message on the subject has been dispatched to the Congress and the country. Bills of every size and shape have clogged the hopper. Legislative proposals on the subject have paraded up and down committee calendars, and back and forth between the Houses of Congress.

All to no avail. No new national policy has evolved, no major legislation has been placed on the statute books.

As a practical matter, the impasse on the question of racial segregation, as well as the threat of inflation, greatly reduces the likelihood of enacting any bill allocating Federal money for public education.

Instead of continuing the fight on the same old battlegrounds, firing the same old arguments and the same rebuttals, I believe the time has come to look for agreement and for action in new directions. And make no mistake about it, we urgently need to agree. The educational needs of our youth pose one of the severest challenges of our day.

A great Nation which can agree on devoting funds and resources to its pines and its pigs can surely find an acceptable way to aid its pupils.

In 1957 the Federal Government spent three times as much money on pigs as it spent in support of the Nation's system of 68 land-grant colleges and universities. It spent almost as much supporting the price of peanuts as it did in boosting education in the high schools of the country. Federal spending for trees exceeds the direct spending on public school pupils.

Our programs for fish and ducks in 1958 exceeded our spending on general, nationwide public education.

Surely our childlife deserves as much as our wildlife. Our pupils deserve as much as our pigs, pines, or peanuts.

It is with the hope of pointing out a new direction which might lead to agreement and action that I offer my first suggestions in this field.

I believe the best way to aid education is to strengthen the States—strengthen their responsibility for education, and their ability to discharge that responsibility.

Most Federal grant-in-aid programs emphasize the Federal leadership. They are hedged with careful and complete restrictions. They are enacted with a full set of criteria; and the States must conform if they are to get their share. In such an aid program, the State has about as much responsibility and authority as a puppet.

A Federal aid for education program which followed this model would be a disaster for education, for the States, and for the Nation.

A successful program for aid to education must enhance the State's authority as well as its ability.

Both the proposals I am offering meet these tests.

One of the two bills I am offering would return to the States, for educational purposes only, 2 cents of the Federal tax imposed on each package of cigarettes consumed in the State. In addition, it would repeal certain Federal educational programs and thus leave the States free to carry them on without Federal restraints or redtape.

The other bill I am proposing would simply return to the States, for educational use, the equivalent of 1 cent per package of cigarettes consumed in the State, without any reduction in Federal programs.

I offer them as alternative approaches to the problem.

The Federal tax on cigarettes is 8 cents a package, and it produces annual revenues in excess of $1.5 billion. Return of 1 cent of this tax would restore about $180 million a year to the States; 2 cents would return about $360 million.

The functions which would be turned wholly over to the States by the one bill would cost the Federal Government about $148 million a year under present authorizations. These functions are: Vocational education programs, and provisions of the National Defense Education Act making grants to the States for purchase of teaching equipment—title III; for programs of testing and guidance and counseling—title V, part A; area vocational education programs—title VIII; and grants for State education statistics—section 1009.

First. These bills would not extend Federal aid as such. They simply would restore to the States some of their own money, tax revenues collected within the State from its own citizens. Congress need not concern itself with the question of the use of these funds by the States for maintaining segregated schools, for transportation to private or religious schools, or any other similar vexatious issue because every cent furnished each State would come from the pockets of the taxpayers of that State and simply be returned. No Federal funds, in a strict meaning of the term, would be involved. Furthermore, because of the direct correlation between the source and the distribution of the funds, these proposals do not run afoul of the usual arguments of budget officials against earmarking. Unlike the earmarking of gasoline taxes for the highway program, my proposals would return to each State the exact amount collected within the State and only that exact amount.

Second. The bills would not shatter the Federal budget. Furthermore, one of them compensates for a part of the revenue shift by turning over specific functions to the States.

Third. They will not require a great Federal bureaucracy to administer and operate. The task of computing the amount to be returned to each State will be relatively simple. At least 42 States now tax cigarettes. So, each State's share of the Federal collections can be determined from the State tax receipts, or from per capita cigarette consumption figures where there is no State tax.

Fourth. The bills will strengthen the States. The funds will be directly available to them for improving their programs of public education. While the funds returned to the States would be earmarked for education, the Federal restrictions would end right there. The money could be used for construction, for equipment, for salaries, for vocational education, or in any other way the State might decide. The Federal controversies about the use of funds, the control of education, and the question of integration would all be avoided. States could put the money to work meeting the most pressing educational needs within their own borders with greater flexibility and efficiency than they can now.

Fifth. Furthermore, this approach lends itself to a complete withdrawal of the Federal Government. Once the shift of revenues and functions is completed, it will be an easy matter for the States to increase and the Federal Government to reduce the cigarette tax so that even the collection functions will be entirely within the control of the States.

Sixth. The Federal programs relinquished to the States will concentrate the responsibility in a constructive, effective way. They are programs which the States are well qualified to assume in full because they already bear a large share of the responsibility for them.

Mr. President, I digress to state that this proposal is completely in line with the efforts of the conference of Governors of the States, which for many years, and more intensely of late, has sought to have the Federal Government, so far as it can afford to do so, relinquish certain taxes or certain fields of taxation to the States, in order that the States may not be drained of their resources and may raise their own money for their own necessary functions and purposes.

Mr. President, I would be the last to contend that either of these bills represents the perfect solution to the vexing educational problems of today. But they avoid the blind alleys and dead ends which have halted progress of every other proposal for aid to education in the past decade. I believe they deserve careful consideration from every person who is interested in the welfare of public education in America.

I further believe that proposals of this type—perhaps not exactly as I have prepared them, but proposals of this type—constitute the only real chance of getting some aid for education from this or any of the immediately succeeding sessions of Congress.

Mr. President, I introduce these bills at this time so that Members may have a chance to look them over before debate opens on Federal aid to education. I introduce and send these two bills to the desk for appropriate reference. It is my present plan to offer one or both of these alternatives as a substitute for or as an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the measure now on the calendar, which will be considered shortly by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BYRD of West Virginia in the chair). The bills will be received and appropriately referred.

The bills, introduced by Mr. COTTON, were received, read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, as follows:

S. 2831. A bill to strengthen State governments, to provide financial assistance to States for educational purposes by returning a portion of the Federal taxes collected therein, and for other purposes; and

S. 2832. A bill to strengthen State governments to provide financial assistance to States for educational purposes by returning a portion of the Federal taxes collected therein, and for other purposes.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL MONDAY

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, in accordance with the order previously entered, I move that the Senate stand in adjournment until Monday next at noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p.m.) the Senate adjourned, under the order previously entered, until Monday, January 18, 1960, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, JANUARY 14, 1960

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Matthew 25: 40: Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me.

Most merciful and gracious God, may our prayer, at this noon hour, be one for the forgiveness of all our sins in the realm of human relations and for that peace which comes from pardon.

We acknowledge with humility and shame that we have so frequently taken a supercilious attitude toward our fellow men whom we do not regard and count our equal.

Wilt Thou forgive the blindness of our pride and prejudice which fails to see the worth of the least of Thy children and those in our social order who are unlike ourselves.

Grant that we may be purged of all our selfishness and petty self-concern and our indifference toward the untold numbers of needy and helpless members of the human family who are finding the struggle of life so difficult.

Hear us through the merits and mediation of that lowly Man of Galilee who came to proclaim the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Sundry messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House by Mr. Ratchford, one of his secretaries.

RE-REFERRAL OF SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 42

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Senate Joint Resolution 42, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, be re-referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

CIVIL RIGHTS—THE PRESIDENT CONTRADICTS HIMSELF

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Speaker, may I remind my colleagues who heard the President deliver his state of the Union message in this Chamber that he made reference to civil rights legislation, and I quote a portion of his remarks:

> Early in your last session, I recommended legislation which would help eliminate several practices discriminating against the basic rights of Americans. The Civil Rights Commission has developed additional constructive recommendations. I hope that these will be among the matters to be seriously considered in the current session. I trust that Congress will thus signal to the world that our Government is striving for equality under law for all our people.

Now the important point to me, and evidently it was important enough for the President to include it in his official message, is the specific reference to the recommendations of the Civil Rights Commission, which the President described as "additional constructive" recommendations, and that he hoped that "these will be among the matters to be seriously considered."

I heartily agree with these Presidential remarks made before the United States Congress on January 7 of this year. And indeed, I was happy to hear our Chief Executive make reference to the fact that, and I quote, "the right to vote has been one of the strongest pillars of a free society" and that "our first duty is to protect this right against all encroachment."

Certainly the Civil Rights Commission recommendations in the area of voting, as well as in other areas, is based on well-founded facts and documentation. So when the President made specific reference to protecting the right to vote, and then subsequently gave emphasis to the Commission recommendations, I thought surely he meant he was anxious to see this Congress act positively in guaranteeing the right to vote when we finally get the chance to act on civil rights legislation.

Mr. Speaker, evidently I was mistaken in my first burst of enthusiasm engendered by these Presidential statements, because only this morning I read the President's comments on civil rights legislation at his news conference of yesterday, January 13.

I would like to read the questions posed to the President and his answers:

QUESTION. Mr. President, you asked the Congress to study the recommendations of the Commission on Civil Rights in your state of the Union message.

The PRESIDENT. Yes.

QUESTION. Do you agree with the majority of the Commissioners that a law is needed to provide Federal registrars when Negroes are denied the right to register or vote?

The PRESIDENT. I don't know—as a matter of fact, I don't even know whether it is constitutional. What I am saying is, or what the Commissioners said, this was one plan that they thought might have some measure of validity, and, therefore, they wanted to study it. Now, the way I feel about this civil rights, we have one bill that was put in last year in which extensive hearings have been heard—had; and I should like to see the Congress act decisively on this particular proposal, and such other proposals made as—that now become almost controversial from the moment that they are presented—would not enter into the proposal or to the process of examining and passing the bill that was already put before the Congress.

QUESTION. You mean——

The PRESIDENT. You see, I don't have any—what I am trying to get at is, I have no objection to the study of the others. As a matter of fact, I want to study them because I would like to see what everybody thinks about it. My big problem is, though, let's get this bill already proposed on which they have had hearings, let's get that acted on.

Now, if I can translate this, I would say the President did not take a positive position in his press conference to parallel what I felt was a clearly stated position in his state of the Union message. It appears to me he was for the recommendations of the Commission in his state of the Union message, delivered on January 7, but is now backtracking or vacillating on January 13. What will be his stand, say, tomorrow?

I respectfully ask my colleagues across the aisle, particularly the minority leadership, what does the President really mean? What will the administration finally support when we do meet the civil rights issue on this floor?

On further consideration, perhaps the proper person to make this matter clear is the Republican Presidential designate, Mr. RICHARD M. NIXON. We shall eagerly await his answer.

CIVIL RIGHTS LEGISLATION

Mr. ASHLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. ASHLEY. Mr. Speaker, I have been most interested in the remarks of my colleague from California in which he points out, with typical incisiveness, the striking disparity in the President's attitude on civil rights legislation as set forth in his state of the Union message and the hesitant, retrogressive, and disappointing statement on the rights issue which he made at his press conference yesterday.

Unfortunately, this inconsistency on the part of our national leadership is not confined to civil rights.

In his state of the Union message, the President spent considerable time discussing the dangers of inflation and our balance of payments deficit. In the next breath, however, he lauded a settlement of the steel strike which can only trigger price increases throughout our entire economy and add to our balance of payments problem.

The only way that the President can make sense out of this situation is to proclaim steadfastly that there is nothing inflationary about the steel settlement. He goes even further, of course, and maintains that any suggestion that Vice President NIXON or the administration forced a steel settlement is just plain silly.

The President explains that Mr. NIXON's role in the matter "was a very simple affair." He goes on to say that negotiations had been deadlocked for a long time and there was no prospect of a settlement before the injunction obtained by the administration was scheduled to expire. Under the circumstances, says the President, he asked Mr. NIXON and Secretary Mitchell to act as mediators, and he goes on to relate that they made a proposal, after going to each side and working very hard, that was a solution between the positions taken by the management and the union.

Mr. Speaker, all of us know the President as a sincere and truthful man, but we also know that he is sometimes badly advised and ill informed.

Certainly this must be the situation as far as the steel settlement is concerned. After all, the President was out of the country for nearly 3 weeks prior to management's sudden capitulation. For those who followed in detail the day-to-day efforts at compromise and solution of the strike, it strains credibility to suppose that the solution proposed by the likely Republican ticket of NIXON and Mitchell was one which had never before been discussed.

I say this strains the credulity of the average person because the average person knows full well that the negotiating teams of both labor and management numbered not in the dozens but in the hundreds, and that a score of experienced professional mediators were on the scene as well. Yet we are asked to believe that it took NIXON and Mitchell to find an acceptable solution and that this solution was gratefully accepted by both sides without the slightest bit of political pressure.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this is only one more example of this administration's habit of dealing with the American public on a basis of fancy rather than fact.

But the real shocker in yesterday's Presidential news conference, Mr. Speaker, was the denial that the politically contrived strike settlement would result in inflationary increases in the price of steel.

I do not know who gave Mr. Eisenhower this piece of advice, but I doubt if there is anyone in the country who has gone beyond the sixth grade that agrees with it. Certainly the steel producers do not—and they are the ones who decide when prices go up and how much. Roger M. Blough, chairman of the United States Steel Corp., is widely quoted as saying that the strike terms "could hardly be regarded as noninflationary." The magazine Steel has stated that higher steel prices can hardly be avoided. It calculates that over the 30-month life of the new contract steelmaking costs will rise about $16 a ton.

In foreign capitals throughout the world it is an accepted fact that U.S. steel prices will rise and that inflation lies ahead for the United States. Failure to stabilize the purchasing price of the dollar is seen to pose a further danger to the U.S. balance-of-payments position and specifically it is seen as a formidable roadblock to our attempt to narrow the gap between U.S. exports and imports.

Mr. Speaker, the seriousness of the consequences can hardly be overstated when we allow political influence to be applied by high administration officials in our already sensitive field of labor-management relations. It is for this reason that I will urge appropriate committees of the House and Senate to scrutinize carefully the record of the recent strike settlement. Meanwhile, I am sure I share the hope of many that the summit meetings between industry and union leaders which have been initiated by Mr. NIXON will henceforth include a taxpaying consumer to represent the American public.

DESECRATION OF PLACES OF WORSHIP

Mr. FRIEDEL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

Mr. FRIEDEL. Mr. Speaker, as you all know from reading the papers during the past few weeks, the hatemongers are back at work.

All right-thinking people view with considerable alarm the recent deplorable series of desecrations of churches, temples, and synagogues in both Europe and right here in the United States. Such outrages against places of worship and religious instruction, be they Catholic, Protestant, Jewish, or other denominations merit not only our severest condemnations, but also call for full recognition of their true source. That such evidences of bigotry are un-American, un-Christian, and foreign to our ideals, no one can deny, since it bears all the earmarks of our former enemy and alien foe; namely, the Nazis.

It is bad enough when the hated and despised swastika—that dread emblem of brutality, coldblooded murder, and utter disregard of basic human rights—is raised in foreign countries, it is unpardonable when this alien and awful symbol makes its unwanted appearance in America, a nation dedicated to liberty, freedom, and justice for all. It is equally as bad as the red flag of atheistic communism and both must be forever removed from our midst.

Some say that these recent paint smears and anti-Semitic words that have defaced the walls of some of our places of worship are but the work of so-called pranksters and crackpots. Others say that it is clear evidence of a well-organized underground movement. But, no matter what it may be, we should have learned the lesson of history, for that is exactly the way Hitler and other dictators started and then came to power. We cannot, we must not, and we will not permit such intolerable acts of hate, bigotry, and un-Americanism to raise their ugly heads in the United States and ultimately destroy our way of life. To this end, I have introduced a resolution in the Congress denouncing such depredations and calling upon every freedom-loving American to help stop this campaign of hate and prejudice before it gets started.

Unfortunately, it seems that few, if any, of those responsible for such vandalism were arrested or punished. If this means that new legislation is required to combat this evil, then let us consider appropriate measures. But, whatever is needed, the time for action is now. America must remain free from religious persecution and prejudice, and it is the obligation of the Congress of the United States to safeguard our freedoms.

Under the Constitution, people are guaranteed the free exercise of their chosen form of worship. And we must never brook any interference with this basic right, no matter what the source, for it is an important part of the foundation of our democracy.

The defiling of our houses of worship with the despicable symbol of nazism should serve to remind us all that the price of freedom is truly eternal vigilance.

THE RULES COMMITTEE AND THE CIVIL RIGHTS BILL

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday while I was absent from the floor my good friend, the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER], chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, made this statement:

> The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN], my very dear friend, stated that I have not as yet requested hearings before the Rules Committee on the civil rights bill.

I advised the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER], my dear friend, a little later in the afternoon that his statement was incorrect, that I had not made such a statement, but that in reply to an inquiry I had stated that as far as I knew he had not requested a hearing, and certainly he had not appeared before our committee to testify.

The gentleman from New York is very fine, a very well educated and a very distinguished gentleman. As I said a moment ago, he is my dear friend, my good friend, but he does have one weakness that seemingly applies to a great many people: He knows so much that is not so. This statement that he made about me is not so. I hope he will correct the RECORD.

Then I want to go a little further, if I may. I want to say to the gentleman from New York that I have consistently voted for civil rights legislation, both in the committee and on the floor, but I do not control the Rules Committee, which is made up of eight Democrats and four Republicans. The agenda of the committee is not made up by the Republican members. Neither can we set the time for holding hearings on an application for a rule.

Further, may I point out that our Democratic friends control the Judiciary Committee, of which the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] is the distinguished chairman, 21 to 11.

Now, in these days of wild statements and politically inspired charges relative to civil rights legislation, it may be well to get some facts, or to look at the record. Here is what has actually happened:

CIVIL RIGHTS BILLS

January 22, 1959, H.R. 3147 introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] 2 weeks after Congress convened. Seventeen days of hearings were not held until March and April 1959.

June 17, 1959, subcommittee ordered H.R. 3147 reported to full Judiciary Committee.

August 5, 1959, H.R. 3147 ordered reported by the full committee with amendments.

August 11, 1959, a clean bill—H.R. 8601—ordered reported by the full committee.

August 20, 1959, H.R. 8601 reported.

August 21, 1959, Chairman CELLER of the Judiciary Committee wrote the chairman of the Rules Committee a routine letter requesting a hearing for a rule. No further written request for a hearing by the Rules Committee had been made up to January 13, 1960.

Congress adjourned on September 15, 1959.

PROGRAM FOR WEEK OF JANUARY 18

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute in order to ask the majority leader about the program for next week.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. I have no program to announce for next week. If anything develops I will give the membership as much advance notice as possible. Two bills have been reported out of a subcommittee of the Armed Services Committee. The full committee meets on Tuesday. Whether the bills can be brought up this coming week I am unable to state now, but I will give as much advance notice as possible.

ADJOURNMENT OVER

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I probably will not, the House has been in session all this week in order to get signatures to a couple of discharge petitions. Is that correct? We have been meeting each day this week.

Mr. McCORMACK. There are discharge petitions on the desk, and the gentleman's statement is correct. If he particularized on the civil rights petition for emphasis that would be more correct.

Mr. GROSS. Have the petitions been signed?

Mr. McCORMACK. Of course, under the rules of the House, one cannot disclose who signs petitions.

Mr. GROSS. I was not asking who signed. But have the sessions of this week each day brought about the necessary number of signatures?

Mr. McCORMACK. From the information I have, there have been a number of Members who have signed the civil rights discharge petition.

Mr. GROSS. Would it not be well to have the House in session tomorrow and Saturday as well?

Mr. McCORMACK. I will not put the gentleman to the burden of objecting to my request. If the gentleman will slightly intimate he would prefer that I withdraw my unanimous-consent request, I will do it.

Mr. GROSS. I was not suggesting that the gentleman withdraw it.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROSS. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I will be glad to do that because I am sure a number of us are debating the advisability of signing that petition.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman would like to have me withdraw my request?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Would the gentleman do that at my request? If that could be done, I will make it.

Mr. McCORMACK. If the gentleman wants me to do it, I would, because if I thought the gentleman would object I would not put the request.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I would not do that. I would not object. If the gentleman wants to withdraw it, I would be glad to help out by making the request.

Mr. McCORMACK. It is a reasonable thing to go over from Thursday to Monday.

Mr. GROSS. Can the gentleman say that the House will be in session next week without any business for the purpose of obtaining signatures to the discharge petition?

Mr. McCORMACK. Until Thursday.

Mr. GROSS. Until Thursday?

Mr. McCORMACK. Until Thursday; yes.

Mr. GROSS. But not on Friday or Saturday?

Mr. McCORMACK. I would not predict for next week what I would want to do then.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

CIVIL RIGHTS LEGISLATION

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I have the highest regard for the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN]. I know his reputation for truthfulness, and I certainly accept his statement. I had read in the public print, a statement attributed to him in turn, that I had not asked for a hearing before the Rules Committee. I took it for granted, and probably should not have done so, that the statement was actually made by him. It probably was a statement made by the reporter who wrote the article in the Evening Star.

However, I again reiterate that the petition is on the Speaker's desk, and I fervently hope we will be able to get enough signatures so that we may be able, shall I say, to circumvent the reluctance of the Rules Committee to give us a rule in order that the House may work its will on this very important legislation, the civil rights bill. The intransigence of the Rules Committee is quite manifest. I applied for a rule and asked the chairman, Judge SMITH, for an opportunity to be heard. Both requests were treated with indifference and inaction.

ESTABLISHING A FREE GUIDE SERVICE FOR THE U.S. CAPITOL

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a minute's time to say a word about my bill, H.R. 9487, to establish a free guide service for the U.S. Capitol.

Actually, I had the bill drafted last year and threw it into the hopper Tuesday with no thought that it would be particularly newsworthy.

But apparently from the press yesterday, I am viewed as a fellow who would like to curb the free speech of the Capitol guides. I am an autocrat who would place a censorship on what is said about Will Rogers and Franklin Delano Roosevelt, Davey Crockett, and those three marble ladies who sit in a tublike arrangement in one of the lower corridors of the Capitol.

Let me assure the members of this body that I am no witchhunter of Capitol guides. The provision forbidding the guide from speaking in praise or censure of any person was to protect both political parties from prejudicial opinions on the part of the guides. I am certainly not in favor of curbing the imagination of these men and women who are the Capitol's hosts and hostesses, but merely trying to insure that, regardless of which party controls the Congress, the information given and the impression made is not slanted.

Actually, my real objective in introducing the legislation was to eliminate the necessity for visitors paying for their tour of the Capitol. It is painful for me to witness American citizens, many of them students and members of our armed services, having to pay to take a conducted tour of their own U.S. Capitol. American tourists come from all over the United States. Many of them must make a considerable effort to get to the Capitol, and I feel that the Government should provide these Americans with a guided tour of the building. After all, is it not kind of silly to give billions of taxpayers' money in foreign aid and then ask another two bits of those who come to see the building where we shovel out those billions. And we have free bulletins about the love life of bullfrogs and care of expectant mothers—which is fine for the bullfrog and baby population. Let us use a little largesse with the American who pays the taxes to support the Capitol and the washing of the statues and the putting up of that new east front.

Then, too, it certainly does smack a little of mendicancy for these men and women—doing one of the really important jobs of introducing the Capitol of the United States to the American people—to hold out a tin cup for 25 cents instead of being paid adequate salaries for what they are doing. Let us get these people into a professional category where they belong.

Now let me give you a quick summary of the situation at the present time with regard to the Capitol guides.

There are 24 Capitol guides, who are appointed by and serve under the jurisdiction of the Capitol Police Board. The Sergeant at Arms of the Senate appoints 12 guides, and the Sergeant at Arms of the House of Representatives appoints 12.

According to my proposed bill, there would be 1 chief guide who would be paid $7,500, and 19 who would be paid $6,000 a year—a total expenditure of $114,000.

Today visitors to the Capitol who desire the services of the guides pay 25 cents each for adults and 15 cents for children. Persons who enter the Capitol as passengers on sightseeing buses also pay the required fee, which is included in their fee for sightseeing service.

The total fees received by the Capitol guides are divided equally among the 24 guides, under rules governing leave privileges and absence from duty.

In order to qualify for a position as guide, the applicant must take at least a week of training and pass an examination covering the information to be given to the tourists. The captain of guides is elected each year by the guide group.

Although exact information is not available, approximately 15,000 persons enter the Capitol each day. On peak days—during Easter week, for example—the guides serve from 10,000 to 12,000 people daily, while in inclement weather they may conduct only a few tours of small numbers of people, and their income is based upon the number of visitors each day. A very rough estimate—no exact figures are available—is that each guide makes about $6,000 a year at the present time.

It is my hope that the House Administration Committee will give this suggestion their careful consideration.

NATIONAL AERONAUTICS AND SPACE ACT OF 1958—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 296)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Science and Astronautics, and ordered printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

I recommend that the Congress enact certain amendments to the National Aeronautics and Space Act of 1958 to clarify management responsibilities and to streamline organizational arrangements concerning the national program of space exploration.

Prior to establishment of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, the Department of Defense had been responsible for all of the Nation's space activities, including those of a nonmilitary nature such as the Vanguard satellite project designed for U.S. participation in the scientific activities of the International Geophysical Year. When the new agency came into existence, with the duty of carrying out a program of space exploration, it became necessary to transfer the nonmilitary projects, with their supporting facilities and personnel, to the new agency from the Department of Defense. The act empowered the President to make such transfers. I exercised this authority on October 1, 1958, when I transferred to NASA responsibility for Project Vanguard and certain other space-related projects previously under the direction of the Department of Defense. I exercised it for the second time on December 3, 1958, when I directed the transfer to NASA of the Jet Propulsion Laboratory at Pasadena, Calif. And today I am transmitting a report advising the Congress of my intention to transfer to NASA the Development Operations Division of the Army Ballistic Missile Agency. The authority granted to the President has thus been used to center in NASA direction of all of the Nation's nonmilitary space activities, and to provide NASA with the facilities and personnel needed to carry out this task.

The act, however, contains a number of provisions which tend to obscure the responsibility of NASA for planning and directing a national program of space exploration and peaceful space activity. For example, there is inherent in the concept—which I believe to be incorrect—of a single comprehensive program of space activities embracing both civilian and military activities, and it implies that a multiplicity of unnamed agencies might have responsibility for portions of such a program.

In an effort to deal with these problems, the act established a scheme of organization of considerable complexity: First, section 201(e) of the act imposes upon the President an unusual degree of personal responsibility for developing this comprehensive space program and of surveying its operations in detail; second, the act established the National Aeronautics and Space Council and gave it the sole function of advising the President with respect to the performance of his statutory duties; third, it made provision for a civilian-military liaison committee, which was given no other duty than providing a channel of advice and consultation between NASA and the Department of Defense.

I have become convinced by the experience of the 15 months since NASA was established that the act needs to be amended so as to place responsibility directly and unequivocally in one agency, NASA, for planning and managing a national program of nonmilitary space activities. This requires, first of all, elimination of those provisions which reflect the concept of a single program embracing military as well as nonmilitary space activities. In actual practice a single civil-military program does not exist and is in fact unattainable; and the statutory concept of such a program has caused confusion. The military utilization of space, and the research and development effort directed toward that end, are integral parts of the total defense program of the United States. Space projects in the Department of Defense are undertaken only to meet military requirements. The Department of Defense has ample authority outside the National Aeronautics and Space Act of 1958 to conduct research and development work on space-related weapons systems and to utilize space for defense purposes; and nothing in the act should derogate from that authority.

I am also convinced that it is no longer desirable to retain in the act those provisions which impose duties of planning and detailed surveying upon the President. We have come to the end of a transitional period during which responsibilities for a broad range of activities were being shifted to NASA from the Department of Defense and NASA's capabilities for discharging those responsibilities were being developed. From now on it should be made clear that NASA, like the Department of Defense in the military field, is responsible in the first instance for the formulation and execution of its own program, subject, of course, to the authority and direction of the President.

With the repeal of the statutory enumeration of Presidential duties, the National Aeronautics and Space Council should be abolished, since its only function is to advise the President in the performance of those duties. The repeal would not, however, affect another provision of the act which provides that the Administrator of NASA and the Secretary of Defense may refer to the President for decision those matters concerning their respective areas of responsibility on which they are unable to reach agreement. This provision should be retained in the law.

The Civilian-Military Liaison Committee should also be eliminated. The statute should go no further than requiring that NASA and the Department of Defense advise, consult, and keep each other fully informed with respect to space activities within their respective jurisdictions; it should not prescribe the specific means of doing so.

Finally, the act should contain safeguards against undesirable duplication by NASA and the Department of Defense in developing the major tools of space exploration. Although a civilian space exploration program is clearly distinguishable from the military utilization of space for defense purposes, both NASA and the Department of Defense may have similar or identical requirements for launch vehicles used to propel and guide spacecraft into orbit about the earth or toward other celestial bodies. I propose that the act be amended to provide that the President shall assign responsibility for the development of each new launch vehicle, regardless of its intended use, to either NASA or the Department of Defense. Responsibility for development of the new vehicle should in no way determine responsibility for its use in space activities.

Amended as I have recommended, the National Aeronautics and Space Act of 1958 would become the organic act of an independent civilian agency having a well-defined statutory responsibility for which it is answerable to both the President and to Congress.

I have requested the Administrator of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration to transmit to the Congress draft legislation incorporating the foregoing recommendations, and I urge that they be enacted by the Congress at the earliest possible date.

CERTAIN TRANSFERS FROM THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE TO NASA—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 297)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Science and Astronautics and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

In pursuance of the provisions of section 302 of the National Aeronautics and Space Act of 1958 I transmit herewith a transfer plan headed "Making Certain Transfers From the Department of Defense to the National Aeronautics and Space Administration." This message, together with the transfer plan, constitutes the report to the Congress, relative to the transfers, as required by the provisions of section 302.

Under the National Aeronautics and Space Act of 1958, the National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA) has primary responsibility for the Nation's program of space exploration. The Department of Defense has responsibility for the Nation's defense program, including the development and operation of space vehicles for defense purposes.

I have recently reviewed the needs and requirements of the two agencies in their respective fields. It is clear that NASA, in order to carry on a vigorous and effective program for the exploration of space, both manned and unmanned, requires boosters for space vehicles greatly exceeding the thrust of any boosters now available. Furthermore, there is at present no clear Department of Defense requirement for such very large boosters. For this reason I assigned sole responsibility for development of space vehicle boosters of very high thrust to NASA last November. In carrying out this responsibility NASA will be fully responsive to specific requirements of the Department of Defense for the development of very large boosters for future military missions. At the same time the Department of Defense and NASA will continue with a coordinated program for the development of boosters based on the current intercontinental ballistic missile (ICBM) and the intermediate range ballistic missile (IRBM) and growth versions of those missiles.

On the basis of this assignment of responsibility the National Aeronautics and Space Administration has assumed technical direction of the Saturn booster project which was previously under the direction of the Department of Defense. This booster which promises to increase greatly the Nation's ability to explore space is being developed by the Army Ballistic Missile Agency and will soon constitute the major workload of the Development Operations Division of that Agency.

The foregoing reflects the pertinent arrangements as they now exist. I have concluded that it is in the best interest of the Nation to take another step at this time—to provide NASA with an organization capable of and equipped for developing and operating large space vehicle boosters and conducting related research. This can be done by transferring to NASA the Development Operations Division of the Army Ballistic Missile Agency and certain supporting personnel. At the same time it is recognized that the Army must continue to be able to discharge its responsibilities for development of missile systems. The transfer plan forwarded herewith is designed to accomplish these purposes.

In carrying out the transfer plan every effort will be made to prevent the dislocation or disruption of ongoing missile or space vehicle projects. The development of military weapons systems and related programs, currently being worked on by the Development Operations Division, will be continued by the Army, utilizing the skills of the transferred personnel as requested by the Army, on a reimbursable basis.

The transfer of personnel, property, and funds, under the plan, will be accomplished in such manner as to serve the objectives I have outlined.

I urge the Congress to allow the transfer plan transmitted herewith to take effect.

MUTUAL SECURITY PROGRAM—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 299)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered to be printed with illustrations:

To the Congress of the United States:

Transmitted herewith is the 16th semiannual report on the operation of the mutual security program for the period ending June 30, 1959. The report was prepared under the direction of the Coordinator for the mutual security program by the Department of State, including the International Cooperation Administration, the Department of Defense, and the Development Loan Fund.

The information set forth in the report demonstrates once again that today our national security is directly involved with nations and happenings throughout the world.

The mutual security program is flexibly designed to meet military threats where they occur and to make an effective contribution toward the cooperative effort of the nations of the free world to promote economic development.

The economic problems of the newly developing nations of the world pose a challenge to our wisdom and energy, and to our steadfastness of purpose, that is as demanding in its own way as the blunt threat of an armed attack. Our economic development and economic aid programs are designed to meet this challenge and its ever-changing problems by selective and prudent use of the talents and resources available under the mutual security program.

The military, economic, and technical assistance provided by the mutual security program is essential to the achievement of our foreign policy objectives. A strong program, vigorously and intelligently implemented, will see the challenge that confronts us surmounted. But a weakening of the program can only invite the destruction of our free-world society.

This report affords the Congress a means of measuring what has been done by the United States and its friends to preserve a world where men and nations can live in freedom, without fear.

THOMAS KENNEDY, PRESIDENT, UNITED MINE WORKERS OF AMERICA

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include a statement by Mr. Thomas Kennedy.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. FLOOD. I take this time, Mr. Speaker, to bring to the attention of the House the fact that Thomas Kennedy, a former Lieutenant Governor of the State of Pennsylvania, a distinguished son of that State, from the city of Hazleton, which numbers among its other attributes the fact that I was born there, is the new president of the great United Mine Workers of America.

We have known him in Washington for many, many years, not only as an officer of that great labor organization but as a public servant of four Presidents upon great missions of domestic and international importance.

Mr. Kennedy is a very gracious, a very calm, and a very fine, sympathetic, understanding gentleman. I know that he will do great good for the men who follow his brilliant leadership, and that that leadership will redound to the benefit of the United States of America as well.

My statement on this occasion follows:

TRIBUTE TO THOMAS J. KENNEDY

This is Congressman DAN FLOOD. I am making this statement in Washington as part of the wonderful tribute that you are paying to my dear friend, Tom Kennedy. We know him back home as a friend and neighbor and, of course, as a leader of the United Mine Workers, a great segment of organized labor; but here in Washington I am proud to report to you that we know him as a statesman. He has served four Presidents of these United States ably and well, not only on commissions dealing with the welfare of the United States but also representing this Nation upon important international commissions all over the world.

We know him in our council chambers here in Washington; we know him in the meetings of the Senate committees; we know him in the meetings of the House committees, where he testifies every year in support of matters affecting the mine workers, not only with reference to matters dealing with domestic affairs alone but in all great and in important things, for his experience, his ability, his great repute for integrity is recognized by everybody in Washington of both great political parties.

And so I come to you as an old friend of Tom Kennedy's, and I am proud to say to Washington as I say repeatedly that he comes from my hometown of Hazleton. But it is pleasant, indeed, it is encouraging, indeed, to know that Tom Kennedy is now the president of the great United Mine Workers of America.

Here is the typical American story if there ever was one—working in the mines as a little child, as you might say, to now gracing the president's chair of a great organization in the Nation's Capital. He is a man from our hometown streets who comes to us in the Nation's Capitol, who sits with kings and presidents and leaders of great nations, bringing to them from his knowledge and from his heart, and from the warmth of his spirit and the understanding of people those things which makes America great.

And so in Washington we are just as proud of Thomas Kennedy as you are back in Hazleton.

The statement by Mr. Thomas Kennedy in accepting the presidency of the United Mines Workers of America is as follows:

I think it should be obvious that I accept the presidency of the United Mine Workers of America with a deep sense of humility, because no one can literally replace a man of the immense stature of John L. Lewis.

I think that history will without a doubt record him as the greatest leader the American labor movement has ever had, and I further think that history will also record him as one of the two or three outstanding Americans of our century.

A change of names has taken place today. No change in union policy need necessarily follow. The policies enunciated and explained throughout the land and to our members by Mr. Lewis down through the years will be the policies of this organization for many years to come. The impress of his 40 years as president of the United Mine Workers of America will not soon be eradicated and our entire membership can rest assured that I will do the best I can to carry out the principles and policies to the *n*th degree.

My faith in the future of the coal industry and its union is deep. The United Mine Workers of America has a fine body of capable men who have already displayed outstanding talent for leadership. They will continue our longstanding policy of battling vigorously on all fronts for better wages and working conditions for the men who mine the fuel that powers America. They will also fight to better the lot of the more than a quarter of a million American men and women who are members of district 50, including our Canadian membership in that district.

We also will continue to cooperate and give every assistance to our Canadian membership in districts 18 and 26. The problems of these districts are difficult and complicated, but I believe eventually these matters will be resolved on a basis that will guarantee stability and employment in the coal-mining industry of Canada.

Furthermore, we will continue our cooperative work with the mining industry in Latin America through the Inter-American Regional Organization Workers (ORIT), as well as render assistance to the Miners International Federation and the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions. All of these organizations are working toward a goal of organizing all workers in underdeveloped countries to fight the infiltration of communism and seek to bring about free organization of labor, free collective bargaining, and raise the standard of wages and living conditions for people throughout the world.

During the coming year the United Mine Workers of America and the coal industry face a host of problems, many of which can and should be solved legislatively by the Congress. I need not here be specific about our legislative program because I believe that right-minded legislators are fully aware of the needs of the coal industry and the legislation that must be passed to keep it vigorous. Among the many things which are of utmost necessity, I would say that we definitely need a national fuels policy.

In time of national stress it has always been coal—not the luxury fuels—that bear the burden of providing energy for American industry and national defense. Congress and the administration must be made to realize that an ailing coal industry is not only detrimental to the American economy but it is dangerous to our continued existence. The United Mine Workers of America will now as always continue to battle against politicians of both parties who are willing to allow the coal industry to sink into obsolescence through neglect or attachment to a special interest. Furthermore, the United Mine Workers of America will continue its vigorous opposition to atheistic communism and exert every possible influence at our command, within this country and elsewhere, to prevent the spread of this evil which threatens our freedom.

MR. THOMAS KENNEDY

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I would be remiss if I failed to note the great loss to the American mining industry, the United Mine Workers of America, and, in fact, the American people by the retirement from the presidency of this great union by its longtime leader, John L. Lewis.

Maybe it is because of my early youth spent in the coalfields of Pennsylvania, or maybe it is because I have spent so many years in the field of legislative action, but I personally feel that the loss of his great counsel in public affairs pertaining to the touchy subject of labor-management relations will be sorely missed by the whole Nation.

In this connection, I believe it appropriate that the following statements by these distinguished men in the industrial life of our Nation ought to be recorded in the RECORD of the Congress:

[From the United Mine Workers Journal, Jan. 1, 1960]

WHAT OTHERS SAY—THE NATION COMMENTS ON LEWIS' RETIREMENT

(By J. McC.)

To each of us in the United Mine Workers of America, President John L. Lewis' decision to retire shortly after the new year is a deeply personal thing.

For 12 years now your editor has worked closely with "the Boss." There are many things that might be said in praise of this man. Almost all of them seem inadequate at this time. Perhaps the best thing that comes to mind was a simple statement made to us some years ago by our predecessor, the late editor of the Journal, Cecil Owen.

"We are working with a great man," Mr. Owen said.

Because we all know in our hearts how we feel about President Lewis, it was with some considerable hesitancy that the Journal considered the question of what to write about President Lewis in this issue.

Then an easy but appropriate answer occurred. The members of the United Mine Workers of America, to whom President Lewis addressed his letter of resignation, obviously know how they feel.

So, let the public speak. Let the editors of the daily newspapers, of the news magazines, the radio and television commentators, the columnists, the labor writers and editors and the reporters who covered Lewis down through the years—let them speak.

Across our desk since December 15 have come thousands of clippings concerning the retirement of President Lewis. We present, herewith, some of them:

"It is possible that the American Newspaper Guild would not be in existence today if it had not been for John Llewellyn Lewis, and it is dead certain that a good many men and women who today are reasonably well paid, reasonably secure in their job opportunities, and reasonably capable of self-respecting labor owe a great deal to that giant of a man. * * *

"He was an indispensable figure in the building of the mass-production unions. There are very few men of his time who contributed so greatly to bringing equity, security, and a sense of strength to humble people who can literally be numbered in the millions. * * *

"He * * * will be remembered when everyone has forgotten the corporate managements with whom—to use his phrase—labor 'was locked in deadly embrace.'" (Willard Shelton in the Guild Reporter.)

"All the citizens of this country * * * are better off because John L. Lewis, a valiant fighter for humanity, has 'passed by here.'" (Charlie Houston, veteran union printer, in the Journal of Labor, Atlanta, Ga.)

"The crowning contradiction of his life came * * * when—after announcing he would retire * * * the coal operators expressed their deep, sincere regret.

"No group ever has a more wretched record of mistreatment of labor than the coal barons. But in the end Lewis made them see the light with a result unbelievable 20 years ago.

"His miners are on the top rung of labor, in wages and benefits, and relations between Lewis and the operators are now so well adjusted there hasn't been a big strike in years." (James Marlow, Associated Press news analyst.)

"In the latest report on Pennsylvania employment and earnings * * * the hourly wage for soft coal miners is given at $3.29 * * * the top of any wage classification in the report, far above the figure for all manufacturing which was $2.16.

"That statistic can stand as representative of what John L. Lewis did for the members of the union to which he devoted his long and memorable career." (The Pittsburgh Press.)

"It was typical that he announced his retirement directly to his membership through the medium of the UMW Journal instead of at a press conference. Equally typical was his refusal to expand to interviewers on his announcement, his preference being to say to no one anything he hadn't told his solidly loyal fellow unionists. * * *"

"Lewis truly has been a volcano of a man, who spewed molten prose, who roared, who glowered, who threatened, seemed born to be caricatured, to be described or quoted, to be hated or followed unquestionably.

"In an increasing timid age, he has been one of the giants." (The Fairmont (W. Va.) Times.)

"There is only one John L. Lewis and the chances are there never will be another comparable figure in the U.S. labor movement. He was not a John Mitchell, William Green, Philip Murray, or Sam Gompers. He was strictly himself—able, resourceful, courageous. * * *

"John Lewis had an unusual capacity for leadership. He was as exacting with his subordinates and the rank and file as he was with the coal industry, the Government, or rival unions. He did not hesitate to pioneer or to take an unpopular stand when he believed his cause was right. His integrity, like his ability, was beyond question." (Wilkes-Barre (Pa.) Times Leader; the Evening News.)

"He is either ardently admired or intensely disliked. People who know him best are in the former category and those who know him least are possibly in the latter.

"Mr. Lewis' unswerving devotion to the cause of the men whom he represented is unquestioned. He has given most of his life to advancing their welfare—and with a degree unmatched in the history of American labor. * * *

"His strongest adversaries in the coal industry privately admire and respect him. Many of them concede he is the most forword-looking figure in the industry." (The Scranton Times.)

"The finest tribute to his career is to be found in the miners' wages and working conditions today as compared with 40 years ago. Today, the miner is at the top of the industrial heap, as he should be. More than that, he has gained a sense of dignity and security compatible with his risks and efforts." (Pittsburgh Post-Gazette.)

"He has remained first in the hearts of his miners * * *. People who shake their heads at such devotion perhaps never saw the bleak streets of a company town and the crippled ex-miners who sat uselessly on their little porches in the old fighting days. * * *

"The miners' hospitals of Kentucky and West Virginia will be lasting monuments to the man who fought for the per-ton assessment that made them possible. They have brought modern medical care to people who for generations knew only the uneven mercies of the company doctor." (The Courier-Journal, Louisville, Ky.)

"To the Nation's reporters and columnists, to cartoonists everywhere, this is a black day in journalism.

"John L. Lewis is quitting and where shall we find another? * * *

"Ah, spring will never be the same in Washington again.

"Once spring meant magnolias, cherry blossoms, tourists—and the end of the miners' contract.

"Then up rose John L. Lewis and great was his wrath.

"Even his silence seemed cosmic. When Lewis decided on the silent treatment, he could stalk majestically through a crowd of reporters like—as one columnist put it—a frigate sailing through a school of minnows.

"Then the contract would be signed." (Arthur Edson, Associated Press writer.)

"Whatever one may have thought about Mr. Lewis in the past, there was never any question of his honesty and integrity. Strong-willed and brave, he fought for his ends with astonishing endurance. He was a formidable opponent, and powerful was the man who could successfully withstand the stripes of his rage.

"A man of Mr. Lewis' strength and purpose would be unusual anywhere. His is a type which is vanishing from the labor movement, giving place to the managers and the administrators and the experts. Labor for its own sake must hope that it can again produce someone of his stature." (New York Herald Tribune.)

"For several years it has become increasingly clear that in public estimation Mr. Lewis ranked head and shoulders above all other labor leaders in the United States. Now that he has announced he will resign early in 1960, more open expression of this esteem will naturally follow." (Morgantown (W. Va.) Post.)

"From the immense reaches of a shadowed room * * * a man looks out on a busy Washington park. His eyes are a little amused, a little proud, and very tolerant of the passing scene. No man yet alive has so molded the times in which he lives.

"Mark him well—the massive head with its great mane of white hair and stirring chunks of eyebrows, the deep sagacious eyes, the brawny shoulders. This is John L. Lewis, the Welsh coal miner who founded the modern labor movement.

"There would be no unions today in most production industries if John Lewis, ever scornful of the timid, had not moved his organizers from the coalfields to the steel mills * * * and set up the Committee for Industrial Organization.

"And he has made the American coal miner one of the best paid, best cared for workers in the world. John Lewis, too, brought to the soot-strewn mine towns of America something very special and very important. He gave the miner a sense of dignity and identity. Before the days of John L. Lewis, back in those towns crouched among the mountains, there were people and miners. In fighting for the miner, he gave them pride and self-respect and human dignity. This, perhaps was his greatest gift to his fellow men.

"Personally, John L. Lewis is a man of great modesty and charm. He can pull from the pockets of his mind, and rumble out in his deep, echoing voice—with its fine shades of emotion—lines from the ancient poets, philosophers, and dramatists." (Tris Coffin, Washington radio commenator.)

"Majesty is the mark of John L. Lewis.

"In his 40 years of labor leadership he has commanded more idolatry and more hatred than any other union chief in the country's history. But even those who damned him most were quick to concede that he was a man of towering personal gifts and that he used them extravagantly. He made his loyal army of coaldiggers the highest paid and most adequately insured group of industrial workers in the world; he stormed the bastions of the open shop in the mass-production industries and led millions of workers in steel, automobiles, and other fields into union ranks; he built a pioneer welfare and pension fund that became a model of industry-financed social security.

"And in the process he conducted epic battles with Presidents, Members of Congress, industrialists, and virtually every other union leader who came to power in his lifetime. He was not a man who believed in speaking softly and he was congenitally unable to accept second place to anyone—even if the 'anyone' held a 4-year lease on the White House." (The New York Times.)

"Away from the public view he is affable, kind, and surprisingly gentle. A smile-wreathed face replaces his well-known stern visage when he sits down and relaxes in the privacy of his office or a hotel room." (Personal and Pertinent in the Scranton Times.)

"We are not so naive as to think that with his resignation * * * the voice of John L. Lewis will be stilled. Can you dam the thunder of Niagara Falls? Can you silence the crushing surf? As much ask an eagle not to fly as to expect John L. to keep quiet. Good luck to him." (The Pittsburgh Sun-Telegraph.)

"More than any other man * * * it is to John L. Lewis that the first 75 years of U.S. labor history belong. Described by ex-President Herbert Hoover as "the most able man in the labor world and of very superior intelligence," John L. Lewis lived up to that billing, whether jousting with a President of the United States or trying to get a mine-owner to knuckle under * * *. He never took on a molehill when there was a mountain around." (The Birmingham News.)

"He took his stand on automation without a quibble: he is for it as far as it can be made to go. Latter-day labor leaders, the younger generations, have been less clear-eyed about this than old John L. Lewis." (Baltimore Sun.)

"Much will be written of his jousting with powerful men. But the real story of John Lewis is the story of how he leaves the coal industry. He saved it * * * it took courage to do this just as it took courage to tell U.S. Presidents not to bother him or to try to mine coal with bayonets. And so, it took courage to step aside when the work of an era was done. It took the courage of a giant. John L. Lewis is that giant." (Labor Columnist Victor Riesel.)

"The American labor movement will seem like a house without a father." (Evening Star, Washington, D.C.)

"Once at a press conference * * * Mr. Lewis became impatient with the laughing and talking. He called for order but the noise continued.

"For a moment he forgot his platform manners. 'Cheese it' he barked * * *. Then he caught himself. Turning to reporters, he said soberly: 'That's off the record.'" (Retired Scripps-Howard Labor Writer Fred Perkins.)

"He is a man of strong convictions who has never compromised his principles and who has never hesitated to speak out forcefully whenever he felt it his duty to do so. That is very probably the reason he will be missed most. Let us hope in retirement, he still on occasion gives us his opinions on matters he deems important." (The Charleston (W. Va.) Gazette.)

"Always the battler in public and in behalf of the miners he called the mighty host, John L. Lewis is also renowned for his courtly attitude around ladies and his loyalty to those he served. His message tonight, stepping down, credited the miners themselves for the great gains in pay and welfare and community respect that they have won, and as one man, the miners erased their own pronoun to write in for the record and tribute: 'John L. Lewis.'" (NBC Commentator Merrill Mueller.)

"In newsrooms through the Nation, this will become known as black Tuesday, for this is the day the reporter lost his best and most colorful source of news. You know, even John L. Lewis' silence was majestic." (NBC–TV Commentator Bryson Rash.)

"There's never been a breath of scandal about John L. Lewis. He never took any kickbacks or payola. In this time when the Nation's morals are on a toboggan, he stood like a Rock of Gibraltar, solid and oblivious to all attacks." (The Bryan (Ohio) Times.)

"Through the late Truman and the Eisenhower years, Lewis showed labor statesmanship of the highest order." (Time, the weekly news magazine.)

"Lewis was a tough fighter, but he was exceptionally intelligent, too. He fought his way to the top of his union, secured a loyalty that made opposition useless, and then used his personal power to improve the miner's lot. Whatever the United Mine Workers are today, they were made that way by John L. Lewis." (The Detroit News.)

"Not only his miners but also the members of the mass-production unions of the old CIO in auto, steel, and rubber industries still regard Lewis as the man who battled for and built the U.S. labor movement. * * *

"Once the ogre of the mineowners, he and the mineowners now work in close cooperation. * * * At one time, the operators never could have conceived the concern, the sorrow, they felt this week." (Business Week.)

"The historic Lewis will emerge clearly as a leader devoted to the welfare of his rank and file. His constant objective has been not a maximum number of dues paying union members, but optimum conditions for the decreasing numbers who mine coal. * * *

"Lewis is a miner and the son of a miner, but a miner who has dreamed that miners' sons might work at other trades and professions above ground. He has done much to make this dream come true. In doing so he has deserved well not only of his union but of his industry and his country also." (Chicago Tribune.)

"May the rest of your voyage be smooth, John." (West Coast Sailors.)

"We recognize with gratitude the inspiration and leadership you provided for all of us." (Joseph Curran, president, National Maritime Union.)

"John L. Lewis made labor history." (Flint (Mich.) Weekly Review.)

"Lewis is the real sire of America's industrial unions and was founder and financial backer of the old CIO. Certainly all such workers, especially his own coal miners, owe a lot to this dynamic, realistic, completely fearless man." (St. Louis Labor Tribune.)

"Nobody could agree at all times with John L. Lewis. Possibly he made some mistakes. Any man as dynamic as he is cannot stop at every twist and turn to make sure that he has made no little mistake along the road. But in the larger sense he was always right because he always made the fight that had to be made. What a monument that is to any man." (The Eye Opener, Local 45, UAW.)

"What a record he has made of service to the rank and file of the miners and all organized labor and to the cause of rock-founded democracy, democracy founded on the right of workers to organize and improve their conditions and their standards, their hopes and their economic security." (R. D. Cramer, editor, Minneapolis Labor Review.)

"The greatest of them all * * *. There'll never be another one like him." (New Jersey Labor Herald.)

"Mankind is the better because of John L. Lewis." (The New Era, United Labor Council of Reading and Berks County, Pa., AFL–CIO.)

"John L. Lewis has been an irritant to Presidents, employers, politicians, other labor leaders, editors (including the writers for labor publications who could never match his marvelous gift with words), the courts, and at times he has annoyed the American people. Nevertheless, we hope he emerges from his 'retirement' often enough to give us a view of his nonconforming personality and the sound of his stirring voice. And knowing John L. Lewis, we're assured that he'll choose to be heard and seen." (Federation News, Chicago Federation of Labor.)

"Let him retire. He has been one of the great labor leaders of the century and he has earned some rest. But let him keep on talking. * * * In the use of the mother tongue there is no one anywhere near his grandeur." (Times, Bayonne, N.J.)

"One of the last of the great individualists, he battled for the economic advancement of workers with skill, courage, and endurance, and he has left an imprint on this country which will last for a long time to come." (Journal-Every Evening, Wilmington, Del.)

"Certainly, but for him and his kind, communism might well have absorbed the United States in years gone by. There is no question but that his role in our free enterprise system prevented American working men and women from turning to godless communism for solution to their plight, and provided hope to labor the world over for a brighter future. * * * The world is richer, democracy is stronger for his having passed our way." (Fred W. Luigart, Jr., in the Hazard (Ky.) Herald.)

"John L. Lewis made a major contribution to organized labor. * * * He is a man of courage and tenacity. And even his enemies have never accused him of corruption." (Houston (Tex.) Post.)

"If it is too early to count the old champ out, it is also too soon to try to assess fully the force of a personal militancy unsurpassed at the tipple, the bargaining table, and amid the tiers of tycoons." (Tennessean, Nashville, Tenn.)

"Whether one agrees with what he has done or not, one must agree that what he did, he did well." (Banner, Nashville, Tenn.)

"Lewis says he will ask the UMW to give him an honorable discharge. He certainly has earned one. For no matter what faults he may have, the labor movement might never have done so well without his leadership." (Tribune, Salt Lake City, Utah.)

"What Mr. Lewis has done in recent years is to make a smaller number of mines and miners more efficient and thus keep the industry on the best possible footing. The price of coal has actually been reduced while the miners have been getting their increased benefits." (Transcript, North Adams, Mass.)

"He kept his word. Once he pledged himself and his men to a contract or an agreement, he honored the pledge and saw to it that his men did also. * * * More often than not there was sound reason for his candor." (Press, Middletown, Conn.)

"John L. Lewis * * * who for years had struck terror at the bargaining table * * * had become the chief architect of survival of an industry * * *.

"One wonders what Lewis would have done, knowing how he championed mechanization and efficiency in the coal mines about the same issue that now divides the steel industry. (Item, Clinton, Mass.)

"We are losing what can ill be afforded—one of the last of the oldtime, hell-raising individualists to survive into an era of uniformism and goody-goodism.

"He has told off the whole Republican Party, the whole Democratic Party, several Presidents of the United States, hundreds of coal mine managers, and a dozen other labor leaders including Samuel Gompers, William Green, William Hutcheson, and Phillip Murray.

"He never hesitated to denounce anything or anybody, including the courts. But—and this is the whole point—he never did it out of littleness or spite. And he never acted at all except in behalf of what used to be the most tragically depressed men in the world, the coal miners.

"In every waking moment for 40 years he looked after his people. He never, never let them down.

"There never was a better coal salesman than old John L.

"John L. was one self-made man who, in the big things, did an excellent job of it.

"He never wrote solemn manifestoes about the real meaning of Indian neutralism. But he sure did try to decide what should be done about pay and working conditions in the coalpits.

"He became one of the only true aristocracy—those who don't for any reason hit people who are smaller than they are * * *.

"John L. was a kind of minor and rough-diamond Churchill * * * grand of manner, purple, sometimes, of language, but devoted always to those who trusted him." (Washington columnist William S. White.)

"The verdict must be that Lewis was a man who did his work well and maintained the militancy essential to improve the lot of an underprivileged group of Americans and become a legend in the process." (Fresno (Calif.) Bee.)

"None exactly can take his place. He's the only one of his kind.

"Regardless of title, whenever miners gather, it must be said of John L., as it was of Rob Roy MacGregor: 'Where he sits there is the head of the table.'" (News-Call Bulletin, San Francisco.)

"Men who once called Lewis a saboteur of the coal industry and 'the best salesman for oil and gas,' today admit with some reluctance that he has been far ahead of most other labor leaders in his philosophy and his accomplishments." (The Advertiser, Huntington, W. Va.)

"Once * * * somebody suggested that John L. would make a wonderful Secretary of State. He would have, too. Imagine him banging that big fist on a desk, and telling those furriners where to head in. Too bad they never gave him the job—isn't it?" (Sentinel, Waterville, Maine.)

"When 'Mr. Eyebrows' * * * walks off the stage * * * he will leave with head unbowed, one of labor's great." (Independent, Southbridge, Mass.)

"His own miners worship him, as well they should. Once they were among the poorest paid and most dangerously employed of American workmen. Now they walk with the aristocrats of labor." (Journal, Meriden, Conn.)

"History will inevitably record that he played a major part in the shaping of America as we know it today." (Herald, New Britain, Conn.)

"The honesty and the dedication always shone through. It shines even brighter today, when too many labor leaders have replaced the crusading slogans of a generation ago with a plaintive, 'What's in it for me?'" (Berkshire Eagle, Pittsfield, Mass.)

"An era of labor is passing. Winner or loser, angel or sinner, John L. Lewis was no hollow man. Like him or not, he stood for vigor, which is a commodity with which we shall never be oversupplied." (Press-Herald, Portland, Maine.)

"He spoke like a combination of Job and Jeremiah. * * * This was no act. Mr. Lewis was a sincere, zealous, ardent, champion of labor. He was a genius at persuasion. It was no easy job to build the CIO from the discordant labor groups that were its first members. He had an immense reservoir of moral courage." (Times, Hartford, Conn.)

"He has never been the kind of labor leader who would fall back on the fifth amendment when called upon to testify. On the contrary, his expositions carried a thunder and an honesty that became a conspicuous force in the field where he labored. * * * One had to respect him." (Telegram, Worcester, Mass.)

"To the generations which knew the thunder of his gravelly voice and the power of his name, he ranks as one of the most remarkable figures of our times." (Bulletin, Providence, R.I.)

"I have not always had the warmest feelings for John L. Lewis * * * but * * * one * * * realizes that * * * he did a magnificent job." (Eleanor Roosevelt.)

"There were times when Lewis' tactics frightened the Nation. But, despite strikes and shutdowns during the war, production was never allowed to stop. Mr. Lewis was annoying and aggravating, but he was an American and a patriot." (Advocate, Stamford, Conn.)

"Labor's practical man, John L. Lewis, is about to step down." (Times, Pawtucket-Central Falls, R.I.)

"He talked about the miners the way Hercules might have talked about the club he carried on his shoulder." (Murray Kempton in the New York Post.)

"He told a rank-and-file UMW meeting during a contract crisis:

" 'I have never faltered or failed to present the cause or plead the case of the mineworkers of this country. I have pleaded your case from the pulpit and the public platform; in joint conference with the operators of this country; before the bar of State legislatures; in the councils of the President's Cabinet; and in the public press of this Nation—not in quavering tones of a feeble mendicant asking alms, but in the thundering voice of the captain of a mighty host, demanding the rights to which freemen are entitled.'

"He liked to speak that way." (Edward Kosner in the New York Post.)

Mr. Speaker, I want to join my colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLOOD], in drawing attention to the fact that Thomas Kennedy takes over the leadership of the United Mine Workers of America today. I served as a member of the State senate in Pennsylvania when Tom Kennedy was the Lieutenant Governor of that great State. He has always been a man who understood the problems not alone of labor and of industry but of all the people of this great Nation. I predict for him a great and successful career as president of the United Mine Workers.

INTERNATIONAL IMMORALITY

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, I allude again to the state of the Union message of our President. He said, among other things, after talking about "a storm of semantic disorders," that "we must live by what we say." I say amen to that.

I ask, When will we start?

Our Nation can be looked upon as a moral nation as long as we not only talk morals but act morally. One of the most immoral things that has been done by our Department of State in many a day is its approval of the World Bank loan for the improvement of the Suez Canal. That is no different than saying we condemn the theft but that we will receive the stolen goods.

Here is a nation under a dictator that has no respect for its obligations—a nation that is constantly violating its treaty and convention obligations, and yet we condone it.

What is worse, we say, "We will lend you money with which to carry on your violations."

No loan should be made to a morally irresponsible borrower. Moral irresponsibility is irrefutably established when a nation unilaterally disregards its treaty or convention obligations or otherwise violates such treaty or convention obligations.

This rule should apply with equal force to acts of confiscation, expropriation, and the like.

The seizure of the Suez Canal was as vicious and violent a violation of treaty obligations as is imaginable.

The subsequent unilateral misinterpretation by Egypt and the United Arab Republic of the clear language requiring free international transit of the canal is inexcusable. The continued seizure of ships and cargoes and the detention and harassment of crew members by the United Arab Republic cannot be too strongly condemned. The granting of a loan by the World Bank to the United Arab Republic for use on the Suez Canal and the approval of the granting of such loan by the U.S. Government is an immoral condonation of these illegal and immoral acts.

All of this adds up to legal precedent to sustain the illegal demands of the Panamanians with reference to the Panama Canal.

MILITARY PERSONNEL ABROAD SHOULD BE PROTECTED BY AMERICAN JUSTICE

Mr. POFF. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. POFF. Mr. Speaker, I understand that Capt. John W. McEnery, of Cheyenne, Wyo., has been relieved of duty by the U.S. Army, apparently at the insistence of the Department of State. The penalty was imposed because the captain ordered two sergeants to shave the heads of Korean prostitutes who broke and entered a military reservation in South Korea.

I would like to direct some questions to the Army and State Department.

First. Is it true that for some time prior to this incident there had been a history of prostitutes cutting the wire fences and otherwise unlawfully invading the military compound?

Second. Is it true that these prostitutes had been repeatedly warned to stay off the reservation?

Third. Is it true that there has been a high incidence of venereal disease on the post?

Fourth. Is it true that no physical injury was inflicted upon the prostitutes?

Fifth. Is it true that American servicemen involuntarily stationed abroad and their mothers, sisters, wives, and sweethearts at home still have the right to expect basic protection from their Government against the depredations of diseased harlots, narcotics pushers, and other criminal predators?

Sixth. Is it true today that, to appease the wounded vanity of a foreign nation which American blood helped to liberate, America will forsake American justice and penalize an American officer who has done his duty to his country and those entrusted to his command and protection?

PROTECTION OF MILITARY PERSONNEL

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, in view of what the gentleman who just left the well of the House said, let me say, I read the account of the incident to which reference was made. I have one grandson, an officer in the Navy. I have a son who was in the Navy. Last Saturday, another grandson, as fine a young man as ever lived, who was just married, took ship to serve as a private in Germany. What I want to know is: Do you mean to tell us that, under the policy of the Army and the Department of State, prostitutes can go into the quarters of these young men we send overseas—can go into the quarters of our men—crawl in bed with them and, if the prostitutes are caught and punished, the Army demotes the officer who inflicted the punishment? Is that it?

Mr. POFF. If the gentleman will yield, I cannot say that that is the policy generally but that is what happened on this occasion.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. The wives, the mothers—yes and every decent individual—would like to know the overall policy.

Is the young man, into whose bunk the prostitute crawls, to get out of it, or crawl under it? Is that policy an essential part of our program to keep free nations, the free people of the world? If it is, we better "go home Yanks."

WATER SHORTAGE

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. RHODES] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. RHODES of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, a bill is being introduced today by me and a number of gentlemen in this House to which I would like to draw attention. It is a bill to permit cities and towns in all sections of the country where needed to supplement their dwindling supplies of natural fresh water with water converted to fresh from sea or brackish sources.

For many years we have known that fresh-water supplies are limited for communities in the East and Midwest as well as the West. Many have been, and are, facing critical shortages. Supplies are already inadequate to meet the demands of our growing municipal, industrial, and agricultural requirements. With an expanding population we are faced with serious shortages unless the conversion of brackish and sea water can be speeded up and made economically feasible.

Last year a small California community, Coalinga, made U.S. history by becoming the first city in the Nation to obtain its municipal water supplies by converting salt-contaminated underground water to fresh. This converted brackish water is relatively expensive. It costs the citizens of Coalinga $1.45 per thousand gallons, but it eliminated the necessity of hauling in water at a cost of $9.35 per thousand gallons.

Coalinga is not an isolated example of the problem many of our cities now face. Clear evidence of the growing shortages that confront us is supplied by the number of applications received by the Office of Saline Water of the Department of the Interior from cities and communities seeking to have one of the five authorized saline water conversion demonstration plants located in their area.

Over 200 site applications were received from 32 cities and communities in the 50 States of the Union. Most of these cities are seeking one of the demonstration plants because they are almost desperate for additional supplies of fresh water, and for many, converted sea or brackish water will be the most reliable and economical new source of supply.

The bill which I am introducing is designed to assist cities and communities to solve their water supply problems by providing for a Government loan to finance the design and construction of a sea or brackish water conversion plant.

The only course of action now open to most cities and communities that now plan to purchase the necessary conversion equipment to provide this new source of water is to raise the necessary funds through a general obligation or revenue bond issue. These bonds will undoubtedly bear a high interest rate which would increase substantially the cost of the product water. The citizens of the cities and communities that have no other choice but to turn to converted sea or brackish water as their source of supply are certainly entitled to obtain that water at the lowest possible cost. By providing a Government loan to finance these necessary projects, we will assure a reasonable interest rate, which in turn, will lower the rate the city must charge its customers for this necessary commodity.

The bill permits any State, territory, possession, political subdivision thereof, or publicly owned public utility organization to apply to the Secretary of the Interior for a loan to finance the design and construction of a sea water or brackish water conversion plant. The loan may not exceed 90 percent of the cost of design and construction—excluding land and water costs—or $1 million, whichever is smaller.

If the Secretary finds that the construction is feasible and that the loan would be a reasonable risk, he may approve the application and transmit it to Congress. If Congress approves the application by resolution within 60 days, an appropriation may be requested and if the appropriation is made the loan may be completed.

Congress would thus have ample opportunity to pass on the operation of the program. This bill offers no blank check arrangement by which tax money could be channeled into useless or unfeasible projects. It would make possible the use of the national credit by States and communities to get started on doing something about their water problems before we are faced with real emergencies.

I would much rather use the Federal credit this way than wait until we are faced with emergencies calling for crash programs and large outlays of Federal money.

The loan must be repaid in 40 years, with interest at a rate that is fixed by estimating the average annual yield on Government obligations with a 15 year or longer maturity date.

The bill also permits the Secretary to contract with the borrower for the use of the borrower's plant facilities for further research and demonstration, and reasonable compensation for such use may be made by a credit on the borrower's loan.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RHODES of Arizona. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. UDALL. I would like to say that my colleague has performed a distinct service in drafting this legislation and I am happy to join with him as cosponsor.

Mr. RHODES of Arizona. I thank the gentleman, who is one of the Members of the House who has introduced this bill.

LABOR LEGISLATION

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker—

Though the mills of God grind slowly, yet they grind exceeding small.

To me that sentence carries both a warning and a promise.

A warning and a promise that justice and punishment will overtake the wrongdoer.

An implied promise that he who perseveres when his cause is just, will ultimately succeed.

I note the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GROSS] is listening, and I hope he will take courage, for he certainly has been doing his best to bring about some economy in our Federal Government, but has often been discouraged. However, in the end I know he will come out all right for he is on the right track. It may be he will not see his victory until after we are broke, but he will get there in the end.

Last year we passed a so-called remedial labor bill. That bill was helpful to the union man, but it did not cure the basic evil.

There is no question but that our people will become aware of what has happened and what is now going on. There is no question about what they want. They want some of the existing evils abolished. The bill we passed last year did not do the job, because we either did not have the courage or the inclination—whichever it was—to do what we knew we should do.

This reference is to the failure of the Congress to insist that the Department of Justice enforce legislation which will protect the rights guaranteed by the 5th and the 14th amendments.

I am talking now about that provision in those two amendments; one which applies to the Federal Government, and the other to the State governments, which guarantees that the individual shall have the right to enjoy his own property; that it shall not be taken from him without due process of law—just compensation. And to substantiate the claim that the basic evils which existed then, that is, when we wrote the Landrum-Griffin bill, exist now.

I refer to the strike not so long ago in Wisconsin.

I talked with some of the representatives from Wisconsin. They say this statement is correct, and it is worthwhile thinking about at least. Permit me to summarize the press story.

TWO HUNDRED STRIKERS FIGHT POLICE, RIP UNIFORMS

NEENAH, WIS., January 8, 1960.—Two policemen were injured and several others were knocked down and their uniforms ripped Friday in a melee with 200 to 300 strikers.

* * * * *

Further clashes were foreshadowed when nine strikers' wives marched on the city hall to protest police aid to the nonstrikers and asserted they would have their families in the picket line tomorrow.

* * * * *

PIN POLICEMEN TO GROUND

As the nonstrikers marched between the two thin lines of policemen, the mob closed in on them from both sides. Groups of policemen were isolated from the others.

POLICE CHIEF STILP USED TEAR GAS TO RESCUE POLICEMEN, DEPUTY SHERIFF HOSPITALIZED

Chief Stilp fired a tear gas cylinder to disperse the crowd, he said, and to prevent injury to the beleagured policemen. "It was something I had to do because the crowd was getting out of control," he said.

* * * * *

TEAR GAS ROUTS MEN

Deputy Sheriff Wilbur Fuller, 35, of Oshkosh, also was hospitalized. He suffered burns and other effects from the tear gas. A striker, Russell Tollard, was taken to the hospital in the belief a rib had been broken but he was released when no injury was found.

Firing of the tear gas broke up the melee and the nonstrikers then entered the plant.

POLICEMAN BREAKER—CHEST INJURIES—TAKEN TO HOSPITAL

Policemen Durward Breaker, 35, of Neenah, incurred chest injuries when the strikers piled on him. He was taken to Theda Clark hospital where it was said his condition may be serious and that he may have suffered a heart attack.

OFFICIALS DO THEIR DUTY

"The right to strike doesn't include the right to gather in masses," Mayor Chester S. Bell told the delegation. "If the strikers had confined themselves to picketing, there would have been no violence. They have the right to strike but not the right to prevent others from entering the plant."

"It is the job of police to protect nonstrikers as well as others," Chief Stilp said. "The law says we must."

"We will protect everyone's right to strike," said City Attorney Charles Schaller. "If there was a congregation of men led by the management, we would have to do the same thing."

Permit me now to refer to the strike at High Point, N.C., and to quote excerpts from the press. This is the caption, "Police Alert as Violence Flares":

HIGH POINT, N.C., December 31, 1959.—Shotgun ambushes, dynamitings, rock throwing, firebombs, and old-fashioned assault are features of the Teamsters' strike at the local terminal of Bottoms-Fiske Trucking Co., and at terminals in Charlotte, N.C., and Danville, Va.

* * * * *

The latest in a chain of violence occurred the night of December 22 when someone hurled a stick of dynamite from a passing automobile.

* * * * *

The dynamiting was the first act of violence at the firm since December 10 when the home of a nonstriking driver was peppered with buckshot and a picture window blasted in. At the same time a driver was slightly injured in a shotgun roadside ambush while driving a Bottoms-Fiske truck between Siler City and Randleman.

THE JUDGE RELEASED 12 TEAMSTERS LOCALS, INCLUDING 391

Local 391 has been under a trusteeship for 9 years. A segment of the local, which charges abuse of members, waste of moneys, and conspiracy to prevent an election, is seeking to oust present officers and the secretary, Lloyd Huggins. D. S. Willard, local 391 president, estimates the local will be self-governing by March. It has about 3,600 members, according to the local, scattered from North Wilkesboro to the North Carolina coast.

Those two references show that, not withstanding the new legislation, union goons keep on destroying property and beating up individuals.

Then, to bring it directly to your attention, permit me to quote an editorial from the Chicago Tribune of January 12, last:

WHAT'S NEW WITH THE GOONS

We think it meritorious that the mayor, police chief, city attorney, the small police forces of two Wisconsin towns, and the Winnebago County sheriff's police did their best to maintain law and order the other day when a couple of hundred strikers put on a pitched battle at the gates of the Neenah Foundry Co., at Neenah, Wis.

The outnumbered police sustained rough handling, but they held their ground and wound up in command, while nonstrikers whose entry into the plant the goons sought to prohibit were able to go to work.

Even more commendable than the courage of the law enforcement agencies were the declarations officials made of the principles on which they acted. When a delegation of strikers' wives informed Mayor Chester S. Bell that it was the purpose of the massed pickets to prevent anybody from working, the mayor calmly replied:

"The right to strike doesn't include the right to gather in masses. If the strikers had confined themselves to picketing, there would have been no violence. They have the right to strike, but not the right to prevent others from entering the plant."

Chief of Police James Stilp added, "It is the job of police to protect nonstrikers as well as others. The law says we must."

City Attorney Charles Schaller also emphasized that the law enforces equality of treatment. He promised to obtain an injunction if there is a continuation of mass picketing and disorder.

These attitudes are in refreshing contrast to the craven behavior of authorities at such other sites of industrial disorder as Albert Lea, Minn., where the police and sheriff's men have done virtually nothing to halt a reign of strike terrorism against nonstrikers at the Wilson & Co. packing plant. The Democratic Governor, Orville Freeman, first tried to load the decision in favor of the union by calling out the national guard and closing the plant on the pretext that such action was necessary to save life.

When he was thrown for a loss by the courts, he sat back and allowed the goons to take over, with little hindrance from local authority. One nonstriker has compared the results to Communist terrorism in Hungary.

Appropriately enough, Emil Mazey, secretary-treasurer of the United Auto Workers, whose goon auxiliaries were sent from Michigan into Wisconsin at the height of the Kohler strike a few years ago, turned up in Albert Lea to express solidarity with the packinghouse union. He promised not to let them down.

Mazey's valiant statement was made as a third of the goons sent to Kohler, Wis., in 1954 was being arraigned on a fugitive warrant at Mount Clemens, Mich. Two other of Mazey's sluggers have already been sentenced to prison for an assault which was followed by the death of William Bersch, Sr., a Kohler nonstriker. So when Mazey promises help at Albert Lea, the effect is more than a little sinister.

As you note, in this article they refer to Emil Mazey, who is secretary-treasurer of the UAW–CIO and who is Reuther's right-hand man.

Mazey is the man who 10 years or so ago under oath at Clinton, Mich., said that he had brought 400 "educators"—he named them that, I call them goons—into a town of less than 1,600 people to educate the people. He said there that the purpose was to lend encouragement to the strikers; and that he proposed, by violence if necessary, to solidify the lines and keep the workers out.

FROM CLINTON HEARINGS

After Mazey testified that he took 400 people from Detroit and vicinity to Clinton, a distance of 70 miles, the following occurred. The page references are to hearings held October 21, 1947—hearings before the Special Subcommittee of the Committee on Education and Labor, House of Representatives, 80th Congress, 1st session, "Labor-Management Disputes in Michigan, Indiana, Ohio."

Page 326:

"Mr. HOFFMAN. And did that intending that they should do what, when they got there?

"Mr. MAZEY. I said we were going down there to protect our people; stop them from being pushed around.

"Mr. HOFFMAN. Do you mean—what do you mean by protection?

"Mr. MAZEY. Well, if any scabs attempted to push our pickets around as they had done on the occasion on which the back-to-work movement was organized, we wouldn't stand idly by and see them pushed around.

"Mr. HOFFMAN. You were going to use force and prevent that?

"Mr. MAZEY. If our people were pushed around; yes.

"Mr. HOFFMAN. You mean that you were going to use—you mean that if the employees of the Thomas Co., of the Clinton Machine Co., attempted to go through the picket line you were going to assist your pickets in keeping them out?"

Page 327:

"Mr. MAZEY. I did not say that."

* * * * *

"Mr. MAZEY. What I said was that if any of our people on the picket line were to be pushed around as they had been in the previous—Mr. Thomas incidentally beat up on the president of our local union physically, a man of about 220 pounds. If that had occurred we would have given our people protection.

"Mr. HOFFMAN. Now, I think we have had that three times on the record.

"Mr. MAZEY. Yes, sir.

"Mr. HOFFMAN. And we accept it as your statement. Now, my question is this, Was it your purpose if when you got to Clinton you found a picket line down at the plant and that the employees or some of the employees of the company attempted to go through that picket line and if it became necessary in order to get through for them to push or shove your pickets aside that you were going to call for action from so many of your 400 supporters as might be necessary to prevent that?

"Mr. MAZEY. That was our purpose and our record there speaks for itself. We did not prohibit anybody physically from going into the plant.

"Mr. HOFFMAN. I say, did you intend to use as many of your 400 from Detroit as might be necessary to strengthen that picket line?

"Mr. MAZEY. Our people walked the picket line that morning.

"Mr. HOFFMAN. Your people from Detroit?

"Mr. MAZEY. That is right.

"Mr. HOFFMAN. Now, you say, you contend that the picket line there in Clinton had not been keeping the workers who wanted to return, from going into the plant?

"Mr. MAZEY. I did not say that.

"Mr. HOFFMAN. Well, do you say that—wait, put it this way——

"Mr. HOFFMAN. * * * This statement that I read: 'We are going to demonstrate to employers in small towns that they are not going to push our workers around.' Now, as to these other employers in other towns what were your 400 going to do?

"Mr. MAZEY. We just wouldn't tolerate the smashing of our picket lines, that is what I said.

"Mr. HOFFMAN. What would you do in Clinton that would tell somebody, for instance, in Dowagiac, some employer, that you—that he couldn't push your folks around?

"Mr. MAZEY. I think if the average employer saw where he was dealing with a small union that this union had the support of a larger organization both physically and financially and morally that they probably would treat our people a lot better.

"Mr. HOFFMAN. He might be induced to make concessions and agreements that the union wanted?

"Mr. MAZEY. Unions operate on that basis; we believe that an injury to one of our members is an injury to all our members.

"Mr. HOFFMAN. Yes. Just stick to the questions. How many pickets were there at Clinton on this day when you went there, approximately?

"Mr. MAZEY. I brought 400 from Detroit.

"Mr. HOFFMAN. Give us—yes; I know, give us an estimate of about how many were there.

"Mr. MAZEY. Probably 550, I didn't count them so I don't——

"Mr. HOFFMAN. Now, I continue to read from the paper: 'This demonstration by the Detroit and Toledo locals is just a sample of what is going to happen if this strike continues.' What did you mean by that?

"Mr. MAZEY. I meant that if the strike was to continue we would bring additional people, thousands if we had to.

"Mr. HOFFMAN. Thousands, if you had to?"

Page 329:

"Mr. MAZEY. That is right.

"Mr. HOFFMAN. Clinton is a town of some 1,600 people?

"Mr. MAZEY. That is correct.

"Mr. HOFFMAN. What were you going to do if the strike continued, what were you going to do with a thousand people down there?

"Mr. MAZEY. Convince the community and the people who wanted to scab that it wasn't the way to settle this matter.

"Mr. HOFFMAN. How were you going to convince them, by just having your people present?

"Mr. MAZEY. Just being present."

Page 330:

"Mr. HOFFMAN. I say, are you familiar with the fact that in Michigan we have a statute which makes it unlawful for more than 50 people to gather together, 30 people to gather together riotously, tumultuously?

"Mr. MAZEY. No; I am not familiar with that and I would like to know what the date of this act is.

"Mr. HOFFMAN. Off the record.

"(Discussion off the record.)

"Mr. MAZEY. We have been conducting strikes for several years and there have been no limitations on our pickets. There isn't any limitation on the number of pickets that we can have.

"Mr. HOFFMAN. There is no limitation on the number of pickets that you can have, but are you aware that you cannot block entrances to any plant?

"Mr. MAZEY. I understand that is unlawful; that is one law that I do not believe in."

Page 331:

"Mr. HOFFMAN. Weren't you the high-ranking union official in command?

"Mr. MAZEY. No; Mr. McAuley was the ranking official in command. I was a visiting fireman that day.

"Mr. HOFFMAN. I see. With 400 assistants. Well, frankly, now, the purpose was to convince Mr. Thomas that the picket line was going to remain around the plant and that any back-to-work movement wasn't going to be successful, wasn't it?"

Page 332:

"Mr. MAZEY. I think we convinced him, we settled the strike that afternoon.

"Mr. HOFFMAN. I say, that was the purpose?

"Mr. MAZEY. Yes.

"Getting back to the observation I was about to make, I want to state that for a number of years we have been assisting sister local unions when they are in difficulty. What took place in Clinton, Mich., has taken place in a number of other communities for the last 10 years. I have been in Flint, I have been in Pontiac, I have been in every section of the State assisting our local unions to settle their problems with management and this is the only time that people seem to have gotten excited in this particular hysterical era that we are living in today with the Taft-Hartley Act and so on; this thing has been made quite an event, quite an affair."

Page 333:

"Mr. HOFFMAN. Quite what?

"Mr. MAZEY. It has been made quite an event, quite an affair, but we have for years, we have been able to build our organization and maintain it on the basis of assisting our local unions when they are in difficulty; we have been doing it for 10 years and we intend to continue doing it.

"Mr. HOFFMAN. Now, let us analyze that just a moment. You intend to continue for example sending in to say Berrien County and Benton Harbor hundreds of thousands of men from other unions in order to assist local unions?

"Mr. MAZEY. If our services are needed; yes.

"Mr. HOFFMAN. And when they come in do you intend to assist them on the picket line?

"Mr. MAZEY. Yes.

"Mr. HOFFMAN. And that is becoming members of the picket line?

"Mr. MAZEY. Absolutely.

"Mr. HOFFMAN. Do I understand that you intend that those picket lines are going to prevent workers from returning to work?

"Mr. MAZEY. No, no; I didn't say that.

"Mr. HOFFMAN. You are going to run right into the local officers when you try that.

"Mr. MAZEY. We have run into a lot of them."

Mr. Mazey was the boss of Jess Ferrazza.

Jess Ferrazza and Communists engaged in violence in the sitdown strikes in 1937, in the Ford strike in Detroit in 1941, and pictures on the wall at the entrance to my office—1424 New House Office Building—show the type of violence.

Also in the office are photographs of the same Jess Ferrazza—taken 13 years later—showing Jess, under Mazey's direction, engaged in similar brutal beatings in the Kohler strike. You will also find photographs of Gunaca participating in violence in the Kohler strike. He went to jail for one offense.

William R. Vinson, to whom the Tribune editorial refers, is another of Reuther's goons. Under Mazey's direction, he beat up a Kohler worker during that strike, served one term, and recently was resisting extradition from Michigan to answer another charge of violence in the Kohler strike.

Here is what the AP recently carried:

HE'LL RESIST EXTRADITION

MOUNT CLEMENS, January 9.—William P. Vinson, a former organizer for the United Auto Workers Union, says he will resist attempts to extradite him to Wisconsin for prosecution on a charge of beating up two Kohler Co. employees at Sheboygan Falls in 1954.

Vinson, 32, who is now a painter in the Chrysler Corp. Vernor plant in Detroit, was arraigned Friday on a fugitive warrant. He was freed on $500 bond pending a formal request for extradition.

Apparently, Mazey is again backing Vinson.

It may be helpful and perhaps interesting to take a look at the propaganda of Reuther. Permit me once again to quote from the Chicago Tribune. A news story written by Chesly Manly on July 18, 1954, not only carries the views of the UAW international representative Burkart, but gives us a little more information about the Reuther and Mazey goon, Vinson, or, as Mazey put it, "educator":

When Robert Burkart, UAW international representative in charge of negotiations, was interviewed, he used such phrases as "standard contract provisions" and "standard practices throughout the country."

"We want to establish the principle of an annual wage increase based upon the improvement in production methods," Burkart said. "Everything at the Kohler plant is on the incentive system. The Kohler company gets more for its production dollar than its competitors do."

WANTS POLICY VOICE

This was a frank assertion that the union wants a voice in management policies. It opposes any improvement of a company's competitive position as a result of increased efficiency and lower production costs. It insists that such savings should go into annual wage increases.

The company has been able to pay high wages and still maintain a competitive position to the advantage of the consumer because of improvements in production methods. Unique machines and procedures, designed in the Kohler plant, eliminate back-breaking toil, increase output per worker, improve the quality of products, and remove safety hazards. The company makes not only plumbing fixtures but electric generator units, gasoline engines, and a hundred varieties of precision control devices for jet aircraft engines. It recently completed an Army contract for 105 mm. shells. Some of the intricate valves for jet engines were designed by Kohler engineers.

The company believes in a free-competitive market and is known for the independence of its sales policies. Shortly after World War II, when a Federal judge in Cleveland dismissed a Government antitrust case against 102 defendants, he commended the company particularly for its avoidance of collusive practices.

FEARS END TO COMPETITION

Kohler believes the union's policies would tend to eliminate competition and force American industry into European-type cartels. Then when industry could no longer meet union demands for higher wages, because of decreased efficiency and higher production costs, there would be powerful inducements for the Government to take over the system.

Burkart, one of Reuther's proconsuls, is not to be confused with the imported goods on the picket line. Redheaded, blue eyed, and fair, he's handsome and is as bland as baby oil. Yet he can snarl as scornfully as any revolutionist. Addressing 1,200 strikers in Sheboygan's armory, he reviled Kohler and E. I. Biever, the plant manager, as psychopaths and ogres who were out to destroy the union and impose a second class substandard contract on the workers.

He read an anonymous letter charging that Allan Graskamp, president of local 833, was "in league with the Communists and the Jews to take over the country."

READS WIFE'S LETTER

"That's the same as Hitler's propaganda before World War II," Burkart said. "The Kohler Co. officials have slyly whispered that this strike has something to do with communism."

Burkart read another unsigned letter purportedly written by the wife of a striker. She complained that she would not be able this year to take her children to the summer camp where they had always gone. She blamed this misfortune on Kohler.

Burkart said Kohler had a colossal nerve to complain about violence, considering that he had compelled so many children "to go without shoes." He jeered at Harold Curtis, a nonstriking Kohler employee, who was hailed as "Harold Curtis, American," in the Kohler Co. magazine after a shotgun was fired through a window of his home on June 28.

"I have called him to his teeth; 'Harold Curtis, scab,'" said Burkart.

BERATES THE PRESS

He berated the newspapers as "scandal sheets" for publicizing the assault on Willard Van Ouwerkerk, 50, a nonstriking employee, in a Sheboygan Falls tavern on June 20. William R. Vinson, 27, of Detroit, has been accused of the assault. Burkart said the papers printed only tiny items when "Brother Vinson" and George Allman, a companion were acquitted earlier in the strike after their arrest for blocking an entrance to the Kohler plant with a station wagon.

Vinson, who was defended by Reuther's man, Burkart, is 6 feet 3 inches tall and weighs about 240 pounds. Van Ouwerkerk stands 5 feet 4 inches and weighs 125 pounds. According to District Attorney John Buchen, the tavern was full of customers who saw Vinson assault Van Ouwerkerk. They have stated that Vinson first hit his victim in the back of the head, knocking him to the floor, and then kicked and stomped upon him with heavy boots until another Kohler employee, a union man on strike, pulled him off.

Here is the nub of the present situation: Just how long will the Department of Justice—what shall I say—fail to do the job which ought to be done, which must be done, in connection with the enforcement of the Hobbs Act?

The Democrats had control of the House when the amendment was adopted, and there is not a man here now who was here then who does not recall how earnestly and persistently Judge Hobbs went about getting an effective act—the judge was an able legislator and, if the legislation he wrote is enforced, much of our trouble will vanish.

At least, in my mind there is no reason at all—unless it be lack of funds and personnel—why the Department of Justice cannot prosecute and convict many of those who are engaged in violence at this time—violence to force others to yield something of value.

When the Department answers, as it does, that it cannot establish motives, I will say they are lacking in—well, they are just lacking in knowledge of how the average juror thinks and reaches conclusions.

I recall that not very long ago the U.S. Supreme Court said that no one was so dumb—they did not use the word "dumb"—that he did not know the purpose of a strike. The purpose is, of course, to secure financial advantage of some kind. In one of the strikes to which earlier reference was made the issue was wages. In the other, it was a closed shop.

There would seem to be no reason why last year we did not write, and insist upon the enforcement of, legislation which would protect the personal right of a citizen, his right to own and use property.

The people were then fully aware of the abuses which were carried on by gangsters and professional criminals under the cover of union leadership. Union men, to the same degree as the average citizen, were resentful of the abuse of the power we had given.

We skirted around the edges but we did not write effective legislation which would protect either the citizen or his property.

I have bills pending before the Committee on Labor and they have been over there for a long, long time, but I have never been able to get a hearing on them. The Democratic majority controls that committee at this time 20 to 10. Permit me to state that partisan politics is not involved. It was not so very long ago that the Republicans controlled the committee, and at no time then did either the chairman of that committee, neither the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. McConnell, nor the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr.

BARDEN, give consideration to this very much needed, basic legislation which will make effective the provisions of the 5th and the 14th amendment.

CIVIL RIGHTS LEGISLATION

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALPERN] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. HALPERN. Mr. Speaker, there is now pending before the Rules Committee H.R. 8601, the civil rights bill, one of the most important measures for congressional consideration this session. Reported from the Judiciary Committee on August 20, the bill has been languishing, awaiting a break in the procedural storm which has been raging around it.

Implementation of our constitutional guarantees is a responsibility of the entire Nation, the need for which was dramatically pointed up by the report of the Civil Rights Commission late last summer. Our job now is to see to it that the bill comes to the floor for debate and consideration by all the representatives of the American people and that Congress carries out its duties under the 14th and 15th amendments.

The vital nature of the subject matter and the procedural tangle in which the bill is enmeshed are powerful reasons for the use of extraordinary measures to assure consideration of the bill. Normally we all would prefer to follow regular practice but in this instance bold action within the rules is not only desirous, it is necessitated by the situation.

The discharge petition can bring the bill to the floor. Those of us who have signed the petition call on Members on both sides of the aisle to add their signatures to the growing roster in the great American tradition of furthering human rights.

I urgently appeal to my colleagues on the Republican side, consistent with one of the basic principles of our party, to meet the issue squarely and to sign the petition. I further appeal to our colleagues of the Democratic majority to stand up to be counted with those intent on effectuating this legislation which is so eagerly awaited by so many Americans. We owe the American people a broadened affirmation of the basic principle of equality of rights, the fundamental tenet of our free society.

Enriching and deepening the meaning of democracy is one of the foremost challenges we face. Opening doors of equal opportunity is the answer we can and must provide. We have the means to begin this effort in H.R. 8601. Mr. Speaker, I strongly urge the Members to sign the petition so that the bill may be brought to the floor for reasonable debate and consideration.

SMALL BUSINESS AND GOVERNMENT PROCUREMENT

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD and include a statement by Mr. MULTER.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Speaker, I am quoting below a public statement of our most able colleague, Hon. ABRAHAM MULTER, as chairman of Subcommittee No. 2 of the House Small Business Committee. The situation therein described is a heartening example of what Members of Congress can do to correct an administrative injustice. Many Members of both houses of Congress made their feelings known to the Department of Defense and the result is gratifying. But most important it rights a wrong and lays the foundation for a directive fair to all and providing efficient service to military personnel and their families.

Mr. MULTER's statement and enclosures follow:

STATEMENT OF ABRAHAM J. MULTER, DEMOCRAT, NEW YORK, CHAIRMAN, SUBCOMMITTEE NO. 2 ON SMALL BUSINESS AND GOVERNMENT PROCUREMENT OF THE HOUSE SMALL BUSINESS COMMITTEE

Congressman ABRAHAM J. MULTER, Democrat, New York, chairman of Subcommittee No. 2 of the House Small Business Committee, announced that the Defense Department has suspended until July 1, 1960, the directive issued on December 8, 1959, in connection with the transportation of military household goods.

This action by the Department was confirmed by its letter of January 12, 1960, to Mr. MULTER. In this letter the Department stated that agreement had been reached with industry representatives to cooperate in the preparation of the directive and regulation which would serve the best interest of the Government and industry having in mind that all concerned were interested in obtaining top quality service at minimum costs for military personnel and their families and that the directive and implementing regulations would be designed to achieve that goal.

In August 1959, Representative WRIGHT PATMAN, chairman of the House Small Business Committee, received a complaint from a small business member of the moving van industry, reporting that the Department of Defense was considering abandoning a rotation system whereby contracts covering such services were awarded in an equitable fashion to all qualified movers. This complaint was brought to the attention of Representative ABRAHAM J. MULTER as chairman of Subcommittee No. 2, which promptly initiated the investigation that has led to the suspension of the proposed directive by the Department of Defense.

Mr. MULTER stated: "This harmonious cooperation by the officials of the Department of Defense, of the Small Business Administration, of congressional committees and of representatives of industry, will surely achieve the desired result. The participation by the Small Business Administration and the Small Business Committees of the Congress, in this effort, in advance of the issuance of a directive and regulations gives further assurance that the interest of small business not only will not be overlooked but will be protected."

Mr. MULTER accordingly announced that he is postponing hearings of his subcommittee on this subject in order to avoid duplication of effort and in order to give the Department every opportunity to work out a fair directive with proper implementary regulations.

This is believed to be a happy solution to a troublesome problem that has been giving much concern to the Members of Congress for a long period of time.

In addition to Mr. MULTER as chairman, Subcommittee No. 2 is composed of the following Members: Hon. SIDNEY R. YATES, Democrat, Illinois; Hon. TOM STEED, Democrat, Oklahoma; Hon. H. ALLEN SMITH, Republican, California; and Hon. HOWARD W. ROBISON, Republican, New York. The Honorable WRIGHT PATMAN is chairman and the Honorable WILLIAM MCCULLOCH is ranking minority member of the full committee.

Attached are copies of the letters between the Department of Defense and Congressman MULTER, dated January 12, 1960.

OFFICE OF THE
ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, D.C., January 12, 1960.

DEAR MR. MULTER: This is in further response to your letter of December 30 requesting that DOD directive No. 4500.26 be suspended. The directive has been suspended until July 1, 1960.

At a meeting this morning, industry representatives and DOD staff agreed that: (1) Military personnel and their families were entitled to top quality service; (2) a directive and implementing regulations to achieve this goal were appropriate.

Spokesmen representing all segments of the moving van industry agreed to cooperate with the Department of Defense in developing an appropriate directive and implementing regulations to achieve this goal. It is hoped that this work can be accomplished to the satisfaction of all concerned prior to the adjournment of Congress, or July 1.

We are looking forward to the continued assistance of your committee and staff in resolving this important matter.

Sincerely,

PHILIP LEBOUTILLIER, JR.,
Acting Assistant Secretary of Defense (Supply and Logistics).

SELECT COMMITTEE ON SMALL BUSINESS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES,
January 12, 1960.

DEAR MR. LEBOUTILLIER: Thank you for your letter of January 12, 1960. I am pleased to be advised that you have suspended your directive 4500.26 pertaining to the movement of household goods of military and civilian personnel until July 1, 1960.

Inasmuch as you will conduct hearings prior to the issuance date to which all interested parties in the above directive will be invited, I am postponing any hearings by my subcommittee so that we can cooperate together in the promulgation of a new directive.

I am positive that this procedure will result in new regulations which will be in the best interests of both the Government and industry.

As you have requested, I am directing Mr. Irving Maness, counsel to the subcommittee, to aid and assist you to that end.

Sincerely yours,

ABRAHAM J. MULTER,
Chairman, Subcommittee No. 2.

OTHER ASPECTS OF THE ADMINISTRATION'S TOP PRIORITY LEGISLATION: INDIVIDUAL SPECULATORS AND INVESTORS PURCHASE ONLY ABOUT 4 PERCENT OF TREASURY SECURITY ISSUE—PROFESSIONAL OPERATORS KNOW IN ADVANCE HOW MUCH ALL OTHER PROFESSIONALS WILL OFFER TO BUY

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, yesterday and the day before I spoke about several aspects of the legislation which the President has assigned top priority. This is the legislation to repeal the interest rate ceiling at which the Treasury can issue long-term bonds.

SOMETHING TO LEAVE THE BANKERS' GRANDCHILDREN

As we know, the forces pushing for this legislation are most powerful and most determined. This administration has only about 11 months more in office, and it is understandable that some people in the financial community are rather in a hurry to have a great deal more of the national debt put on a long-term basis—say 20, 30, 40 years or more—at the present high interest rates, before this administration goes out of office. They want to make sure that President Eisenhower, to use his phrase, leaves something for our grandchildren—and theirs.

But they cannot be sure what events lie ahead even in the few months that this Congress will be in session, and can act on the legislation. The predicted surplus in the Federal budget makes it rather difficult, as a public relations matter, for the Federal Reserve to continue its part in maintaining interest rates in their present orbit—which orbit reaches well beyond the moon.

Furthermore, despite all the predictions that this will be a boom year, it is entirely possible that the recovery trends may not continue as strong as they now seem. Almost anything could happen. So this may be a sort of a last chance for the promoters of the drive to put the Government under contract to pay astronomical interest rates over the next several decades, on a sizable portion of the $180 billion Federal debt.

Today I wish to call attention to an aspect of the so-called Government securities market, where the Treasury must go, hat in hand, to borrow money.

THE TREASURY'S MARKET IS A SMALL GROUP OF WALL STREET PROFESSIONALS

According to reports from the financial community, the 1-year bills which the Treasury auctioned day before yesterday attracted an unusual amount of interest on the part of individual investors. The alltime bargain rate which was predicted for these bills—which prediction came true—caused an unusually large number of individuals to submit bids for these bills. The bills were sold at a discount which yields an interest rate, by normal methods of computation, of 5.36 percent. This was indeed a bonanza which individuals who have the sort of money it takes to invest in these bills should want to get in on. The Wall Street Journal of yesterday described individual interest in the Tuesday auction as follows:

> Although New York sources told the Treasury a rush by individuals was on, the application figures released by the Treasury don't show that it was overwhelming.

Now the important question is, just how much of the securities issued by the Treasury are purchased by individuals?

Altogether, the bids submitted for the $1.5 billion of bills amounted to $2.3 billion. In other words, the issue was oversubscribed by less than 2 to 1.

Of this $2.3 billion of offers to purchase the Treasury bills, the Wall Street Journal reported that specialists in the so-called market estimated that about $100 million was submitted by individuals—although there were a "whacking" number of bids by such investors. The point is that although there is a "whacking" number of people around Wall Street and the Waldorf-Astoria Towers who bid or subscribe to Treasury issues, the amount of their purchases is, relatively speaking, very, very small. In fact, if these estimates are correct that individuals accounted for $100 million of the bids, out of a total of $2.3 billion, then individuals accounted for only 4 percent of the total.

Not only are subscriptions from individuals small, but they have even less influence in determining the price of Treasury issues sold at auction. Individuals are permitted to make "at the market" bids—open bids—and generally do bid in this manner. In other words, they bid to accept the average of the prices at which the securities are sold to others. So the prices named by the professionals determine the price.

The so-called market for the Treasury's marketable securities is in reality, a small group of professionals. My estimate would be that 90 percent of any given Treasury issue is purchased by between 100 and 200 big banks, professional bond dealers, and insurance companies. Most of these are centered around Wall Street.

It could be wished that we had more exact information on this subject. As a matter of fact, when the Joint Economic Committee was making its study of the Government Securities Market last summer, I asked Secretary of the Treasury Anderson for information on this subject of how sales of Government securities are concentrated in a relatively few banks, securities dealers, and so on, and he promised to cooperate; but so far, I have seen no report on this subject.

EACH PROFESSIONAL KNOWS HOW MUCH ALL PROFESSIONALS ARE GOING TO BID

The Members will find, I think, that one of the most interesting aspects of the Treasury's "market" for securities, is that each time the Treasury puts a security up for auction, or puts one up for subscription at a fixed price, the professionals all know before the bids or the subscriptions are made what the total amount of all the bids or subscriptions is going to be, within a very small margin of error. Sometimes a Treasury issue is oversubscribed four times, five times, six times, or more. For example, the 4-year and 10-month issue of last September was oversubscribed 12 times.

But according to testimony given before the Joint Economic Committee last summer by the Secretary of the Treasury and by several of these professionals themselves, oversubscription does not mean what it would first appear to mean. It does not mean that these professionals wish to buy 4 times, 5 times, or 12 times the amount of the securities which they actually do buy.

When there is an oversubscription, the Treasury allocates the amount it issues among the various bidders on the basis of the oversubscription. In other words, if an issue is oversubscribed 4 to 1, the Treasury allocates to each bidder one-fourth the amount he has offered to buy.

What oversubscription means, then, according to testimony, is that each of these professionals knows what the total subscription is going to be and bids accordingly. In other words, a professional who wishes to buy $1 billion worth of a Treasury issue, knowing that the oversubscription will be 4 to 1 puts in an offer to buy $4 billion worth. And he makes a cash deposit to cover his offer for that amount. As matters turn out, he will then receive the $1 billion which he intended to buy in the first place.

As far as these professional investors are concerned, the matter of oversubscription is no game to be taken lightly. Their testimany makes it clear that if they should be wrong—if by some chance they misjudged the amount of the subscription, and the Treasury ended up accepting their offer as submitted—they would lose their shirts. In other words, they do not wish to buy and do not have the money to buy anything like the amounts they offer to buy. So the remarkable thing is that the professionals not only have an estimate of what the total subscriptions will be, but they have an estimate in which they must, as a matter of practice, be able to place very high confidence. In other words, each of the professional operators in this market has an estimate for all which is necessarily based upon an intimate knowledge of the firm plans of each and every professional operator in the market.

So, when we hear the statement that the Treasury "ought to be allowed to pay the market rate," it would be well to keep in mind what kind of market it is that makes this rate.

A POINT 4 YOUTH CORPS—TO ENABLE MORE YOUNG AMERICANS TO PARTICIPATE IN TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE PROGRAMS

Mr. REUSS. Mr. Speaker, as we enter the decade of the 1960's, we recognize certain characteristics of the new age.

While we must seek always for progressive disarmament on the part of East and West, and while we must present continuing constructive proposals to resolve the differences between East and West, the main theater for the drama of the 1960's will be the developing countries of Asia, Africa, the Middle East, and Latin America. The way we play our role in that theater will help to determine whether our civilization will survive.

Many Americans are haunted by the image we now cast into these areas. Our aid has been generous. Yet we have the gnawing fear that we are not succeeding. Too often our emphasis, rightly or wrongly, seems to concentrate on military alliances with corrupt or reactionary leaders; on furnishing military hardware which all too frequently is turned on the people of the country we are presumably helping; on grandiose and massive projects, such as superhighways that please the monarch but do little to please his people; on hordes of American officials living aloof in enclaves in the country's capital.

POSITIVE STEPS NEEDED

The picture painted by "The Ugly American" is no doubt exaggerated. But rather than spend all our time denying the validity of the picture, why not take some positive steps to prove that the picture is untrue?

With this in mind, I have today introduced H.R. 9638, an amendment to the Mutual Security Act, to provide for a study looking toward a possible Point 4 Youth Corps of young Americans willing to serve their country in public and private technical assistance missions in far off countries, and at a soldier's pay.

TEXT OF BILL

The text of H.R. 9638 explains its purpose:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 307 of the Mutual Security Act of 1954 is amended by inserting "(a)" immediately after "SEC. 307. Advances and Grants; Contracts.—", and by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(b)(1) The President shall provide for the conduct by a nongovernmental research group, university, or foundation of a study with a view to ascertaining the advisability and practicability of the establishment by the United States of a program, known as the 'Point Four Youth Corps', under which young citizens will be trained and serve in programs of technical cooperation. The objectives of the Point Four Youth Corps will be—

"(A) to make additional technical manpower available to United States agencies and to private agencies carrying out economic, medical, educational, and community development programs in underdeveloped friendly foreign countries;

"(B) to assist in broadening the understanding by the peoples of other nations of the ideals and aspirations of Americans, through close contact with young Americans participating in the Point Four Youth Corps; and

"(C) to offer our young people an opportunity to serve their country in a stimulating way, while broadening their understanding of the problems facing other peoples and nations, and thereby helping them better to understand American policies and purposes abroad.

The President shall endeavor to have such study conducted as a public service without Federal contribution toward the expenses thereof; and any Federal contribution which may be required for such study shall not exceed $10,000, to be paid out of sums appropriated pursuant to section 304 of this act.

"(2) Within 1 year after the date of enactment of this subsection, the group, university, or foundation which conducts such study shall report to the President and to the Congress its recommendations with respect to the establishment by the United States of the Point Four Youth Corps, and if the establishment of such Corps is recommended, such report shall be accompanied by draft legislation proposed for the implementation thereof. The report shall include, but not be limited to, the consideration of the following factors—

"(A) The types of projects in which members of the Point Four Youth Corps might be used, based upon investigation of existing and proposed private and governmentally sponsored projects, and how such projects should be carried out;

"(B) The manner in which interested private American foundations, and groups such as service clubs, religious groups, farm organizations, labor unions, business groups, youth groups, and similar organizations, might cooperate in the operation of Point Four Youth Corps projects;

"(C) Whether or not it would be desirable to provide that service in the Point Four Youth Corps shall be considered as satisfying the obligation of individuals to perform training and service in the Armed Forces;

"(D) The optimum size of the Point Four Youth Corps, the period of service which might be required and the pay scales and conditions of employment which would be most desirable in the public interest;

"(E) The pattern and manner of orientation and training in the United States and abroad that would be required to make young American adults effective workers in programs of technical cooperation conducted under this title or otherwise;

"(F) Whether it would be practicable and advisable to recruit young American adults who have completed less than four years of college;

"(G) Whether the Point Four Youth Corps should be placed under the administration of a Federal agency or a private group on a contract basis, or both; and

"(H) The manner in which the Point Four Youth Corps could most usefully supplement current governmental and private programs of technical cooperation.

"(3) The group, university, or foundation which conducts such study is authorized to secure directly from any executive department, bureau, agency, board, commission, office, independent establishment, or instrumentality, information, suggestions, and statistics for the purpose of this subsection; and each such department, bureau, agency, board, commission, office, independent establishment, or instrumentality is authorized and directed to furnish such information, suggestions, estimates, and statistics directly to such group, university, or foundation upon its request."

SUITED FOR PRIVATE STUDY

The study of the practicability and advisability of a Point 4 Youth Corps is peculiarly one for a private university foundation or similar group. Since much of the utility of a Point 4 Youth Corps would be for private rather than public technical assistance missions, the study should not be governmentally conducted. As H.R. 9638 indicates, it should not be difficult for the President to find a private group willing to make such a study at no cost to the taxpayers.

H.R. 9638 sets forth the principal issues which such a study would need to resolve—the types of projects suited for a Point 4 Youth Corps, how they are to be carried out, the mix between public and private projects, the pay and administration of the corps, its relationship to selective service, preliminary training here and abroad, age of the participants, and many others.

The study group is directed to confer with all appropriate governmental agencies, and if it recommends the establishment of a Point 4 Youth Corps, to recommend draft legislation.

ANALYSIS BY THE LIBRARY

I am indebted to Mr. Arthur H. Darken, analyst in U.S. Foreign Affairs, Library of Congress Foreign Affairs Division, Legislative Reference Service, for an admirable analysis of the nature of the study:

ANALYSIS OF A PROPOSAL FOR THE ESTABLISHMENT OF A POINT 4 YOUTH CORPS

After preliminary inquiry, we find there are some who believe that a Point 4 Youth Corps could be useful in economic and community development enterprises abroad and that the establishment of such a corps would not necessarily meet with insuperable difficulties.

Given the purposes you have advanced we suggest the following in answer to your questionnaire for the establishment, administration, and operation of the corps:

I. INITIAL STUDY

The initial study of the advisability and feasibility of establishing a Point 4 Youth Corps should be commissioned by a relevant executive branch agency, probably the International Cooperation Administration, but should not be conducted by that agency itself. An outside research group, university, or foundation would probably have greater freedom in making its recommendations than would a Federal agency. It must also be reported that many persons concerned with the technical assistance program feel the administration is generally opposed to the initiation of new programs in this field. It seems therefore that more positive recommendations for a Youth Corps might come from a private group than from a Federal agency.

It may be advisable, however, to urge that the private group conducting the study consult with the International Cooperation Administration, other relevant Federal agencies, and nongovernmental organizations active in the field of providing economic and technical aid to the less developed areas. Consultation with interested persons and organizations, while the study is in preparation, could do much to eliminate the administrative impracticalities that sometimes accompany otherwise extremely logical and worthwhile development programs.

The study when completed should be submitted to the commissioning agency and to the Congress.

Past experience with federally commissioned studies as outlined by various executive agencies suggests that this one probably could be prepared for about $10,000 and should not require more than 6 months.

II. RECRUITMENT FOR THE POINT 4 YOUTH CORPS AS AN ALTERNATIVE TO MILITARY SERVICE

It is difficult to decide whether service in the Youth Corps should be planned and advertised as an elective alternative to regular draft military service. The benefits of doing it are clear. It could give much favorable publicity to the technical assistance program and stir up enthusiasm among many young adults here; it could help improve the quality of the American reception in some less developed countries abroad because their people might be impressed by the increased American effort in their behalf; it would make a large pool of young adults available for technical assistance programs so that there would not possibly be any lack of manpower for these programs that can use college students or fresh graduates.

But there are several important factors that cast doubt on the value of this device for recruiting Youth Corps members. The most obvious problem is that only men are draftable while the Youth Corps should include both men and women. It would therefore seem necessary to make some exceptions that would at least provide for accepting young women into the corps with the same remuneration and allowances provided to the young men.

More serious problems involve the possible reaction of the Armed Forces, the Selective Service System, and the veterans' groups to the Youth Corps idea. The most important objection would probably come on the issue of veterans' benefits. For instance, it appears that many would object to giving Youth Corps veterans the same educational, pension, and medical benefits as those received by military veterans. Probably it would take a lot of persuading to convince the armed services and veterans' groups, or even the American people in general, that Youth Corps veterans should receive the benefits that go with actual military service.

Another line of objection to making Youth Corps service an alternative to the draft might be the possible diversion of some of the best young men away from military officer training. Presumably college graduates would be involved in both cases and the number of college graduates available to the draft is always much smaller than the number of noncollege men. But for the present this does not appear to be a serious problem due to the small percentage of men classified 1A that are actually being drafted today.

Another element worthy of careful consideration is the draft itself. If we judge by the discussion last year when the Selective Service Act was renewed, the value of the draft system is questioned by many Members of Congress. This proposal might be opposed on the same grounds, for to some it could imply that the draft is not needed for military service recruitment today and that the proposal is part of a plan to keep the system alive. The Youth Corps as an alternative to military service would also seem to add one more to the already long list of devices whereby young men can escape the draft. This may also create opposition to the Youth Corps idea.

After all of these factors are considered it would seem that service in the Youth Corps would have the greatest possibility of being accepted as an alternative to military service if it were made clear that Youth Corps veterans would not receive any of the medical, educational, pension, or other benefits accruing to military veterans because of their service. This tends to reduce the general appeal of the Youth Corps somewhat, but it might also serve to avoid serious opposition from the armed services and veterans groups and make it easier for young women to participate in the corps. It would also help to weed out those who might otherwise join the Youth Corps as an easy means of securing veterans benefits.

It seems clear that young people recruited into the Youth Corps should have completed at least 2 years of college and preferably have a 4-year bachelor's degree. The experience of both Federal and private technical assistance programs has been that young adults who lack this minimum of education usually do not have sufficient maturity and understanding to be a net value to the program. It appears, therefore, that any attempt to recruit Youth Corps members who are only 18 years old, or who are only high school graduates would meet opposition from almost all interested public and private agencies.

Students might wish to apply for the Youth Corps when they register and are classified for the draft upon reaching their 18th birthday. They could be deferred for the period of their college education as is now done in most cases. At the end of their 4-year course of study students who elected to volunteer for the Youth Corps would have their names placed on a list, given appropriate examinations and interviews and a number selected equal to the projected needs of the Youth Corps for the following year. Those students not selected would revert to their regular Selective Service System classification and be available for military service should they be needed.

The ideal period of service in the Youth Corps seems to be 2 years. Less than that would be uneconomical for everyone concerned. If the service lasted much more than 2 years it might prove unattractive by requiring too long a commitment, especially in terms of the alternatives available.

If the Youth Corps is viewed as an alternative to military service it would seem appropriate to set the salary and allowances to correspond as closely as possible with those for draftees in the Armed Forces. This would be likely to include transportation, medical care, subsistence, and about $60 to $70 a month in cash salary. The International Voluntary Services, which operates more young adult technical assistance groups than any other private agency, uses this scale of salary and services with considerable success. It has approximately 10 applicants for every available opening on a technical assistance team.

How large should the Youth Corps be? This cannot be determined until experience provides some measure of the usefulness of corps members in the economically less developed areas. Some have suggested that a figure of about 10,000 would not be unreasonable for current discussion purposes. The initiating legislation might set this as the initial membership limit, but make it subject to later revision. The actual number of recruits, within the prescribed limit, could be determined each year by the availability of overseas positions for corps members.

Finally, it would seem important to include the provision that recruitment and service in the Youth Corps would be on a nonsectarian basis. This would serve to eliminate unnecessary disputes between the various church groups that will undoubtedly be intensely interested in the Youth Corps.

III. ADMINISTRATION OF THE YOUTH CORPS

There are many possible ways of administering the Youth Corps and there is no obviously best way. In general, however, it seems that the operation of the corps should rest primarily with an agency that has substantial responsibility in the technical assistance field. This will avoid further splintering the responsibility for foreign assistance programs and also help to assure that those in charge of the corps are familiar with the problems and possibilities of assistance programs in the less developed areas.

Second. It seems that this would have to be a Federal agency if persons are to be recruited to the Youth Corps in large numbers as an alternative to U.S. military service. There have been instances in the past, however, when nongovernmental bodies administered alternative service programs.

Third. Given the problems of administering new programs in an existing agency it might be advisable to set up a new division, or bureau, to handle the Youth Corps within whatever Federal agency was given this responsibility.

Fourth. It might be possible to include the interested nongovernmental organizations on a significant advisory committee established especially for the Youth Corps.

There would have to be about a 3-month period of orientation and training in the United States followed by a similar one in the receiving country. The initial period here would permit a final screening of Youth Corps members to help eliminate the misfits and those who are seeking only a vacation in exotic lands. Instruction would be necessary in the particular skills or operations that corps members would be expected to perform in the receiving country. Likewise they would have to be taught the key economic, political, social, and cultural facts about the particular country in which they will be serving and a few basic words and phrases in the local tongue. Nor should the training period overlook some discussion of the highlights of American history, race relations, foreign policy, and contemporary thought. Young Americans abroad are often asked about these matters and many are unable to speak intelligently.

Further training in skills, local conditions, and basic language could be provided in the receiving country. It has been the experience of the International Volunteer Services that students are able to pick up a basic speaking knowledge of the local language with only a month or two of actual life there.

The training and orientation period is crucial to the success of the entire Youth Corps program. Sending immature young men and women abroad as technical assistance workers who are not dedicated to the broad purposes of the corps could have disastrous results. The existing problems of interpreting America to the peoples of Asia and Africa would be compounded and the experience might call into question other American technical assistance programs. The necessity of guarding against the wrong kind of persons as Youth Corps members is particularly important because of the intended method of recruitment. The corps may well attract many young men who regard it as a lark and an easy guarantee against having to perform military service.

IV. PUBLIC AND PRIVATE COOPERATION ON YOUTH CORPS PROJECTS

How would Youth Corps members be assigned by the operating agency and how would private agencies participate in its projects? It is clear that Youth Corps teams could be sent abroad only upon the request of a foreign government. Presumably the request would be made through the U.S. Embassy or aid mission in the receiving country. If the Youth Corps administrator felt this was an appropriate project he could assign Youth Corps recruits to the proper orientation and training here and then send them overseas. The Federal agency could do this under its own auspices. But alternatively it might be possible to place a particular project in the hands of a U.S. private foundation or group recognized by the Youth Corps as responsible and active in the field. This would be similar to the usual contract arrangement whereby many universities and private groups now take part in the U.S. technical assistance programs overseas. Such public and private cooperation would not eliminate the separate programs maintained by these private agencies. Rather it might be regarded by many groups as a highly desirable supplement to their present programs.

It should be recalled that a number of interested private groups would be serving on the Youth Corps Advisory Committee where they should be intimately involved in setting standards for the Youth Corps selection, orientation, and training program. The committee might also advise on preparing a list of private agencies and foundations that would contract to administer Youth Corps projects from time to time.

These are offered as only a few tentative suggestions for Federal and private cooperation in the operation of the Youth Corps. They are not intended to explore all the problems involved, and it has not been possible to check even these few ideas with the interested groups. But the interviews so far conducted do suggest that some private groups would welcome the presence of the Youth Corps and that they would cooperate in particular projects.

V. TYPES OF OVERSEAS PROJECTS WHERE THE YOUTH CORPS MIGHT BE USEFUL

One of the major responsibilities of those studying the advisability and feasibility of establishing the Youth Corps will be to evaluate the types of jobs these young men and women can usefully fill. But the nature of the Youth Corps recruits and of the less-developed areas in which they will be working do suggest several guides to the most likely types of projects.

(A) The members of the Youth Corps will have a substantial amount of college training which sets them apart as already highly skilled workers by comparison with all but the few highly trained people in any less-developed country. But they will have something less than the knowledge and experience of those who are usually sent from the United States as technical-assistance workers. Also, some Youth Corps members will be more useful than others. Those who have majored in agricultural, scientific, and mechanical subjects, and those who have a rural background, may find themselves in high demand, while humanities majors may have to learn alternate skills. It should be noted in this regard that one agency, the International Voluntary Services, restricts its recruitment almost entirely to graduates of agricultural, mechanical, and home economics courses.

(B) It would be inadvisable for Youth Corps teams to do jobs that could be undertaken just as well by unskilled native labor. This is an important consideration, because most less-developed countries have a serious surplus-labor problem. For these reasons, it might be worth while, for instance, to have Youth Corps members show villagers how to dig an improved type of well, but it would not be advisable for a Youth Corps team to dig a whole set of improved wells for a particular village.

(C) Many feel that projects combining both Youth Corps members and trained local people in physical labor are desirable because this may help to break down the stigma that often attaches to physical labor in Asia and Africa. In many of these areas it is not considered proper for a man with even an elementary education to engage in physical labor. This is left to the illiterates. But American groups can help to break down this feeling by encouraging local educated persons to join in work projects that require some amount of skill. This might be a joint American-local school construction, drainage or water supply project.

(D) The spirit in which the Youth Corps projects are conducted is of the utmost importance. The key to effectiveness here is the attitude of fellowship with the local people rather than an attitude of superior-inferior paternalism. The attempt to learn basic words in the local language will help to establish the feeling of fellowship, but there must also be a genuine desire to work with the local people for a common purpose. Mature and sensitive young adults often do this effectively because they are enthusiastic and optimistic about what can be done to build a better future.

(E) The great need for Youth Corps workers probably will be in the village and rural areas where their semiskilled labor will be more useful than in the cities. Most of the few technical assistance workers now available are in the cities performing highly skilled operations as advisers to higher level public servants or technicians.

(F) There is a great demand for English teachers throughout Asia and Africa so that many Youth Corps members would find work in the school systems.

(G) Perhaps more useful than teaching English would be the help Youth Corps members could provide in training native teachers in a variety of subjects such as biology, simple sanitary procedures, mechanics, arithmetic, etc.

(H) A few examples of other types of projects that have been conducted by voluntary agencies using young adults in technical assistance groups include: planting and testing new types of crops for productivity, inoculating, and teaching local farmers how to inoculate farm stock against diseases, helping to clear away underbrush and dense forests to increase the land available for cultivation, and physical assistance in the resettlement of refugees from flood and famine, or from communism.

A SENSE OF PURPOSE

The establishment of a Point 4 Youth Corps would assure an adequate supply of young Americans to man public and private technical assistance missions in the years to come. But there are two even more important things to be said for a Point 4 Youth Corps.

Young Americans in their late teens and early twenties need a sense of purpose—the excitement and stimulus of taking part in real events. The philosopher, William James, pointed this out a half century ago when he suggested in his essay, "The Moral Equivalent of War," that a season on a fishing schooner or on a cattle ranch could well provide the sense of excitement and purpose which war—at least old-fashioned war—was supposed to provide. If the evolution of the have-not nations is at once the greatest challenge and adventure of the age, young Americans are going to want to become involved in it.

SPREAD AMERICAN IDEALS

From the standpoint of a successful American foreign policy, a Point 4 Youth Corps could be equally beneficial. The peoples of the developing countries need economic assistance, but even more they can profit from exposure to the ideas of Thomas Jefferson and Abraham Lincoln. Young Americans who are willing to help with an irrigation project, with digging a village well, with setting up a rural school, could be one of our best ways for creating such a picture of America.

It is said that Napoleon once confessed his failure in these words:

Alexander, Caesar, Charlemagne, and I myself have founded empires; but upon what do these creations of our genius depend? Upon force. Jesus alone founded His empire upon love; and to this very day, millions will die for Him.

Power has revealed its limitations. Why not try a little love?

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may have leave of absence on official business in connection with subcommittee hearings from the 19th to the 28th of this month.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. UDALL). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

SPECIAL ORDERS GRANTED

By unanimous consent, permission to address the House, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered, was granted to:

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado, for 1 hour, today.

At the request of Mr. ALBERT the special order granted to Mr. ULLMAN for today was transferred to Wednesday next.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin (at the request of Mr. MOORE), for 1 hour, on January 18.

Mr. WILSON (at the request of Mr. MOORE), for 1 hour, on January 19.

Mr. FORD (at the request of Mr. MOORE), for 1 hour, on January 20.

Mr. GRIFFIN (at the request of Mr. MOORE), for 1 hour, on January 21.

Mr. RHODES of Arizona (at the request of Mr. MOORE), for 1 hour, on January 22.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri (at the request of Mr. MOORE), for 1 hour, on January 25.

Mr. HALLECK (at the request of Mr. MOORE), for 1 hour, on January 25.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

By unanimous consent, permission to extend remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, or to revise and extend remarks, was granted to:

Mr. SMITH of California.

(At the request of Mr. MOORE, and to include extraneous matter, the following:)

Mr. GUBSER.

Mr. VAN ZANDT in two instances.

(At the request of Mr. BURKE of Kentucky, and to include extraneous matter, the following:)

Mrs. SULLIVAN.

Mr. PORTER.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. BURKE of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 48 minutes p.m.), under its previous order, the House adjourned until Monday, January 18, 1960, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Special Senate Showing of "On the Beach"

OF
HON. KENNETH B. KEATING
OF NEW YORK
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, January 14, 1960

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, it was my pleasure on Monday to sponsor a special Capitol Hill showing of the film "On the Beach." I want to thank all my colleagues and the many other Hill people who were in attendance. The response to my invitation was so overwhelming that two showings were required to accommodate all those who wanted to see this film. I hope that this did not inconvenience anyone.

I recognize that this film is somewhat controversial, and I therefore appreciate the statement which the Senator from Utah [Mr. BENNETT] made on the Senate floor at about the time the first showing of the film started. I have written a letter to the Senator from Utah expressing my sentiments on the subject, and since this letter may be of interest to other Members of the Senate, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
January 12, 1960.

Hon. WALLACE F. BENNETT,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR WALLACE: I have read your letter and statement on the Senate floor with regard to "On the Beach" with great interest and agree with many of your comments.

Of course, any work of art is subject to varying interpretation, and this film is no exception. To me, it conveys a simple message—the importance of avoiding nuclear war and mistakes in the handling of nuclear weapons. I do not regard it as a plea for peace at any price. I do not regard it as a scientific demonstration of the effects of fallout. Art forms frequently have to be overdrawn in order to create the desired impression, and some dramatic license certainly must be allowed those responsible for this film. But I believe it was important for someone like yourself to call attention to its limitations.

I am glad that you agree that the film was worthy of presentation in the Senate Auditorium, and I appreciate the sincerity of your comments.

With kind personal regards,

Very sincerely yours,

KENNETH B. KEATING.

Questionnaire Submitted by Senator Milton R. Young to People of North Dakota

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MILTON R. YOUNG OF NORTH DAKOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, January 14, 1960

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a questionnaire I am sending out to approximately 27,000 North Dakota people.

There being no objection, the questionnaire was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

This questionnaire is being mailed to approximately 27,000 North Dakota people. Included in the list are all North Dakota newspapers, Republican and Democratic, precinct committeemen, 1,000 public officials, every 10th name in the Grand Forks city telephone directory, and many thousands of others representing all occupations.

1. Do you think that foreign aid should be: Abolished? ——. Continued with present amount of funds? ——. Continued with greatly decreased funds? ——.

2. Do you favor legislation to provide Federal aid to education? Yes, ——; No, ——; no opinion, ——.

3. If you plan to vote Republican this year, which of the following would be your choice for President? NIXON, ——; Rockefeller, ——.

4. If you plan to vote Democratic, which of the following would be your choice for President? Humphrey? ——; Kennedy; Stevenson ——, Symington ——.

5. If the following were nominated for President, which one in each group would be your choice? (All candidates listed alphabetically.) Humphrey ——; Nixon, ——. Kennedy, ——; Nixon, ——. Nixon, ——; Stevenson, ——. Rockefeller, ——; Stevenson, ——.

6. Many proposals have been advanced to solve the farm problem. Your views concerning some of the more prominently mentioned programs, as stated in this questionnaire, will be very helpful to me. Space does not permit a more detailed explanation of each program. Would you approve or disapprove the following?

(a) Abolish all price support programs and controls? Yes, ——; no, ——; no opinion, ——.

(b) Provide high price supports and marketing quotas for every commodity a farmer produces, with stiff penalties for violation of marketing quotas? Under this proposal price supports would be based on direct production payments for each commodity. Approve, ——; disapprove, ——; no opinion, ——.

(c) Abolish present mandatory 75 percent of parity price supports for wheat and dairy commodities; elimination of the 15-acre provision; elimination of acreage allotments and marketing quotas; price supports for wheat based on the support level for corn (which is primarily based on a 3-year market price average) with adjustments for differences in quality, etc.? According to testimony of proponents, this would result in price supports of approximately $1.10 to $1.20 a bushel. Approve, ——; disapprove, ——; no opinion, ——.

(d) Provide price supports for wheat at 100 percent of parity (presently $2.36 a bushel) for that portion of the farmers' production which is consumed within the United States. (This would be about half of his production.) For the other half, the producer would receive the market price or whatever minimum price support the Congress might provide. Proponents claim that under this program acreage allotments or quotas soon could be eliminated. Approve, ——; disapprove, ——; no opinion, ——.

7. If it would appear impossible for Congress to agree on any new farm legislation, would you approve modifying the present program to make it more workable until a new one could be enacted? This would envision some further cut in production, reducing the present 15-acre exemption to 12 acres or less, and stiffer penalties for violation of quotas. Approve, ——; disapprove, ——; no opinion, ——.

8. Do you approve of the soil bank program? Yes, ——; no, ——; no opinion, ——.

Name ——————; Occupation ——————

Address ——————

Because of the personal nature of some of the questions, you may prefer not to sign your name. Your vote will be tabulated whether you sign it or not. Results will be mailed to you when completed.

Please return to: Senator MILTON R. YOUNG, 3121 Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

Dedication of the Pfc. Melvin L. Brown, U.S. Army Reserve Center, Clearfield, Pa., November 1, 1959

OF

HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 14, 1960

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, it was my privilege to participate in the dedication of the U.S. Army Reserve Center, Clearfield, Pa., November 1, 1959, at which time I delivered the dedication address.

The new U.S. Army Reserve Training Center has been named after Pfc. Melvin L. Brown of Mahaffey, Pa., who was awarded the Medal of Honor posthumously in 1951 for his heroism while serving with Company D, 8th Engineer Combat Battalion in Korea.

The 20-year-old soldier, the first Pennsylvanian to receive the Medal of Honor, was the son of the late Mr. and Mrs. Edward D. Brown, Mahaffey, Pa. He was first listed as missing in action and later as killed in action. He is buried in the Mahaffey cemetery.

Participants in the interesting program included county and borough officials, while the Clearfield Area Senior High School Band under the direction of Mr. Harold E. Kuhns rendered musical selections.

The dedication address follows:

ADDRESS GIVEN BY JAMES E. VAN ZANDT, MEMBER OF CONGRESS, 20TH CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT OF PENNSYLVANIA, AT THE DEDICATION OF THE NEW U.S. ARMY RESERVE TRAINING CENTER AT CLEARFIELD, PA., NOVEMBER 1, 1959

As a veteran of both World Wars, as a member of the Naval Reserve, and as a Member of Congress who has always supported a strong Defense Establishment, I am especially grateful to be able to return again to Clearfield to participate in the dedication of this training center for those patriotic Americans in our Army Reserve.

It is a particular significance that this new U.S. Army Reserve Center is named in memory of the late Pfc. Melvin L. Brown of Mahaffey, Pa., one of Clearfield County's Medal of Honor winners.

He was killed in action September 5, 1950, while serving with Company D, 8th Engineer Combat Battalion.

Private Brown's outstanding war record is well known.

His valor was recognized by various decorations and awards in addition to the Medal of Honor which was awarded posthumously in 1951 for heroism beyond the call of duty.

This U.S. Army Reserve Center is a dignified memorial serving both a practical and a patriotic purpose—a purpose suited to the character and career of Pvt. Melvin L. Brown.

As a memorial it should prove gratifying to all who knew and loved him—and most of all to his living relatives.

It is regretted that Private Brown's mother died 2 years ago and his father in July 1958.

It is good to think that the surviving loved ones of Private Brown, who made the supreme sacrifice in defense of his country, will have ever before their eyes this substantial evidence of the honor in which his name is held by his grateful country.

On this occasion I should like to salute the officers and enlisted men of the Army Reserve units which will use the new center, namely:

1. Headquarters and Headquarters Battery, 4th Howitzer Battalion, 92d Artillery Regiment.

2. Company D, 336th Military Police Battalion.

3. 353d Ordnance Company (ammunition).

In this time of continuing crisis, the vital importance of this Reserve training center here at Clearfield—and of others like it throughout the land—is clearly apparent.

The United States is confronted by a diabolical enemy who is relentlessly seeking to destroy our way of life.

This enemy is armed with weapons of a destructive power hitherto unknown to mankind, including long-range ballistic missiles which can deliver hydrogen warheads.

With these weapons, the enemy can strike in a matter of hours or even minutes.

Soviet missiles can now be shot at the major centers of population and industry of our West European allies.

Many of the most vital military bases and installations of the free world are within the range of Communist missiles, including some of our oversea airbases, which are an important part of our deterrent force and retaliatory power.

The time is soon coming—indeed, it may have already arrived—when Soviet missiles can be aimed at targets here in the United States.

Never in our history has it been as important for the United States to have powerful and vigilant Armed Forces at its command.

A strong program of national preparedness offers the best chance for deterring an all-out nuclear war.

Strength is the only language which the Communists will listen to with respect.

Only through strength can the free world convince the Communist dictators that aggression will not pay.

To deter war, and to win a war if we should be forced to fight, the United States must have a strong retaliatory force of strategic bombers and ballistic missiles that will strike fear in the hearts of those tyrants who would plot aggression against the free world.

Not only must the striking power of this retaliatory bomber and missile force be very formidable, it must also be made as invulnerable to enemy attack as possible.

At the same time, the United States must strive to develop a more effective defense against attack from Soviet bombers and missiles.

If the United States is capable of deflecting a significant portion of the attacking forces, the enemy will be less likely to launch all-out aggression against the free world.

The security and survival of the United States will be placed in grave jeopardy if we fall behind in the race for military supremacy.

If the Soviet Union should succeed in its attempt to gain a decisive military advantage, the United States is likely to be confronted with the disastrous choice between appeasement or all-out war on terms favorable to the Communist bloc.

The recent achievements of the Soviet Union in missile development—especially during the past 2 years—has increased the urgent necessity for strengthening our ability to deter and, if need be, to win a general nuclear war.

However, the military threat from international communism is by no means confined to long-range missiles and hydrogen bombs.

The ground forces in the Communist bloc outnumber those in the free world by about 2 million men.

The Soviet Army, alone, is over 2½ million strong, whereas there are less than 900,000 in our Army.

The Red Army is the only major ground force in the world today that has a completely new postwar arsenal of weapons.

It is capable of fighting either a big war or a small war, with nuclear or conventional weapons, in any kind of climate or terrain.

At present, strong Communist forces are deployed adjacent to the Middle East, Western Europe, North Korea, Southeast Asia, and Formosa.

The threat of these Communist forces represents piecemeal aggression and is part of a plan to conquer the free world in installments, thus posing an even greater danger than all-out war.

As you well know, during the cold war there have been many diplomatic crises which have been provoked by the blackmailing tactics of international communism.

The dispute over the West's rights in Berlin is a current example.

There have also been several limited-war situations in which maximum firepower was not employed.

The engagements of armed forces in Korea, Indochina, the Formosa Straits, and elsewhere illustrate the dangers of limited war which challenge the free world.

The United States and its allies must have the armed forces which can deter and cope with the threats of limited aggression.

Otherwise, small conflicts may spread into global wars fought with weapons of mutual destruction or the free world may be gradually nibbled to death.

The power needed to deter and repel limited aggression and subversion against the free world is vastly different from hydrogen bombs and long-range missiles.

The forces required for dealing effectively with this kind of situation must be mobile, flexible, and discriminating.

It must be able to engage the enemy without destroying major centers of population and without arousing the moral antagonism of world opinion against the mass slaughter of nuclear warfare.

It should fit the punishment to the crime.

It must be adaptable to a variety of geographic and military situations.

It must not cause the conflict to spread into all-out war.

A strong reserve and national guard is important to our national defense posture.

In past wars—most recently in Korea—the Reserves have been a vital component of our military strength.

In case of either all-out or limited war, the Reserves can put added steel into our Armed Forces.

Our reservists have written a glorious account of themselves on the pages of our Nation's history.

Our first reservists were the colonial militiamen who organized to protect their farms and families against hostile Indians.

The United States has always depended heavily on its reserves of citizen soldiers.

Like the patriotic men who will train at this center, they were peace-loving men who preferred work at their civilian jobs and enjoyed life with their families and friends, free from the disruptions and separations of active military duty.

But in the face of danger to their country these men, with courage and patriotism, always rallied to defend the American way of life.

The progress which our Reserves and National Guard have made during recent years is very commendable.

Our Reserve units have made marked improvements in their organization, training, and general readiness.

They are now more positively oriented toward their primary mission of supporting the active forces.

Better training and recruitment programs have been inaugurated and are now under way.

A larger percentage of Reserve personnel is now participating in the training program.

Better equipment is now being made available.

And maintenance and operations activities have been improved.

In addition, the Reserves and National Guard are now carrying out certain essential air defense functions which were previously performed by the regular services.

In recent years, the reorganization of the U.S. Army has been an almost continuous process.

But the greatest change in the past 25 years has been the conversion to "pentomic" organization.

The "pentomic" organization is now considered the best form of Army structure for adapting nuclear weapons to the battlefield and for deterring and fighting effectively in both limited and all-out wars.

It has now been put into operation in all active Army divisions and nondivisional support units.

If Army Reserve units are to replace, reinforce, or relieve Active Army units in wartime, the organization of the Active and Reserve Army must be identical.

The Army Reserves must be capable of performing according to the most up-to-date principles of strategic and tactical mobility.

The organization, training, and deployment of our Reserve combat and support units must conform to the requirements of modern warfare.

As missions, weapons, and tactics change, the members of the Army Reserve must be prepared to assume new assignments and to become proficient in new military occupational specialties.

As a result of new developments, three important changes in our Army Reserve Forces are now occurring.

First, our Army Reserve units are being reorganized into a "pentomic" structure, so that in case of mobilization they can be more quickly integrated into the Regular Army Forces.

Second, the mission of the Army Reserve is more oriented in the direction of rounding out and balancing an Active Army that in peacetime is unbalanced because of limited manpower and financial resources.

Third, the principle has been accepted that the Army Reserves must be prepared to respond on very short notice in event of a national emergency.

Due to the potential enemy's capability of launching an attack with little or no warning time, the Reserves must be prepared to reinforce quickly our Active contingents, both at home and overseas.

The new Reserve policy is to give priority to the men and material which are most essential in aiding our Active Forces to carry out the objectives of our war plans.

For this reason, the Army Reserve must be organized, trained, and equipped to perform its assigned mission of rounding out and balancing the forces of the Active Army almost immediately after an order for mobilization.

However, our war plans do not require that all Reserve units be immediately mobilized in case of emergency.

Those Reserve units which can be organized and trained after the outbreak of hostilities in accordance with our war plans will receive secondary priority in the allocation of manpower, training, and equipment.

Top priority will go to those Reserve contingents that are assigned the mission of immediately reinforcing our Active Forces at the beginning of mobilization.

Men, equipment, and money are limited.

If these resources are spread too thin, the overall effectiveness of our Reserve Forces will be weakened.

Defense plans have been changed in order to meet the threat of the Communist bloc's increasingly strong capabilities in new weapons and techniques of warfare.

The Reserves must be modified to conform to these plans.

Few will dispute the necessity of this requirement.

An important Reserve policy is the assignment of Army and Air Force National Guard units to Continental Air Defense.

This is a form of combat which properly trained and equipped Reserve units should be able to perform effectively.

Continental Air Defense calls for a number of fixed installations which must be manned at all times and prepared for instantaneous action.

The sites of these installations are very often in or near communities which have National Guard or Reserve units.

By assuming these air defense functions, reservists and National Guard men free active servicemen for other combat duties.

Because of the increasing complexity of modern weapons, training is very important to our Reserve program.

The modern reservist is no longer like the self-sufficient frontiersman who at a moment's notice could simply lay down his plow, pick up his rifle, and march off to war.

The modern reservist must be a specialist and a technician.

He must be skilled in the operation and maintenance of complicated weapons and other elaborate pieces of military equipment.

As new weapons and equipment are introduced, he must adapt his skills to the operation of the most up-to-date tools of defense.

Because the Reserves have an important role to play in our national defense, this country has an obligation to treat the members of the Reserves fair and square.

Reservists serve at considerable sacrifice.

They must not be allowed to become the victims of neglect and discrimination.

Their rights and benefits must be protected.

Reservists have spent considerable time and energy developing assets which strengthen our national security.

These assets to our country's defense should not be wasted.

The best training programs and facilities must be provided to see that they are not wasted.

At present, there are about 1 million members in all of our Reserve and National Guard units.

This is an increase of about 50,000 over 1958.

The support of the Army Reserves and the Reserve Officers Training Corps requires only 2 percent of the Army budget and only 1 percent of the total Department of Defense budget.

In view of the relatively small size of our Active Army compared to that of our potential enemies, the role of the U.S. Army Reserve assumes increased importance.

Since the end of the Korean war, the United States has reduced the strength of its Active Forces.

But there is a limit to how few men we can have under arms or available for rapid mobilization.

If we don't have these men in our Active Forces, then we must have them in our Reserves.

A strong and well-trained Reserve organization is essential to our defense posture.

The Reserves are an effective and economical alternative to the maintenance of a larger standing Army.

America cannot afford to relax its vigilance when confronted by the menace of aggressive dictatorship.

The relentless and unscrupulous forces of international communism are watching intently and waiting hopefully for the free world to drop its guard.

Therefore, a strong program of national preparedness offers the best hope of preventing war.

In this time of continuing world crisis, strength is indispensable to the preservation of liberty, justice, and the American way of life.

Ladies and gentlemen, this U.S. Army Reserve training center which we are dedicating here today in the memory of Private Melvin L. Brown is a symbol of America's strength and determination to defend its freedom.

Ninety-third Birthday of Dr. Francis E. Townsend

OF
HON. CHARLES S. GUBSER
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, January 14, 1960

Mr. GUBSER. Mr. Speaker, this month marks the 93d anniversary of the birth of Dr. Francis E. Townsend, famed as the founder and president of the organization which bears his name. It has been my privilege to have known the doctor for most of the years since the early 1930's, when he launched his movement to bring security and decency to the retired and disabled citizens of our country. In fact, the headquarters of the Townsend organization is located a few short blocks from the Chamber in which we sit today.

Dr. Townsend, I believe, merits far more recognition than has been accorded him. He was, in truth, the vital force which persuaded the Congress to enact a social security program in the first place. Through the years, when amendments have been under consideration, the doctor has appeared on Capitol Hill to urge the adoption of changes which would bring social security closer to his ideal, and to help direct the social security program into even more liberal channels.

The results of his efforts have been substantial. Today we near his goal of universal coverage. We are liberalizing in the direction of benefits made available at age 60. We realize now that disability benefits should be provided at the time the disability occurs, and not at an arbitrary age. And I believe, too, that we are inexorably moving toward his principle that retirement benefits should be geared to actual living costs, thus providing insurance in the finest meaning of the word "insurance."

And so I salute Dr. Townsend on this, the occasion of his 93d birthday. Here is a fortunate man indeed—one who has been given the years necessary to see his dream on the very verge of fulfillment.

The Consumer Interest in the Continuation of Federal Grading of Lamb

OF

HON. LEONOR K. SULLIVAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 14, 1960

Mrs. SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, the House Committee on Agriculture has been conducting hearings this week on the proposal of the Department of Agriculture to suspend for a period of 1 year the voluntary program in effect for Federal grading for quality of lamb and mutton. Because of the widespread interest in this matter, particularly among the Nation's housewives, I include under unanimous consent the statement which I prepared for the committee's hearings giving the reasons why I think the lamb grading program should be continued. In the last session, on several occasions, I placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a number of statements, letters and comments on this matter and there has been such broad response throughout the country to that material that I am sure the statement I have prepared on the current status of the issue will be similarly of interest to many people.

The testimony referred to is as follows:

THE CONSUMER INTEREST IN THE CONTINUATION OF FEDERAL GRADING OF LAMB AND MUTTON CARCASSES

(Testimony by Congresswoman LEONOR K. SULLIVAN, of Missouri, before the House Committee on Agriculture, January 13, 1960)

Chairman COOLEY and members of the Committee on Agriculture, I congratulate the chairman for his prompt action last month in interceding with the Department of Agriculture to continue the lamb grading program of the Federal Government at least until this committee of the Congress can examine the Department's reasons for wanting to suspend the program. If Chairman COOLEY had not acted when he did, lamb grading would have ended on January 4 without Congress having had the opportunity to look into the issues until after the death sentence had already been executed. Now, with this short reprieve—the second in a period of less than a year—I am hopeful the program can be rescued from the death sentence Mr. Benson has imposed.

In the period since the lamb grading program came under attack last summer until now, I have written or wired the Department on a number of occasions urging consideration for the consumer's stake in this important governmental program. Usually, a month or so later, I receive a polite reply telling me what has been decided in the interim, and I therefore cannot help but have the feeling that expressions from individual Members of Congress carry very little weight in the office of the Secretary of Agriculture. For that reason, I feel that it is most important that this committee, after hearing all of the facts in the controversy, follow up on its hearings by reporting out a resolution calling for the continuation of lamb grading. Otherwise, I am afraid the hearings will have been futile, and the Department under present leadership will continue to pay no attention to any views expressed here except those it may happen to agree with at the moment. This, unfortunately, has been the history of the Department's attitudes under the present Secretary.

Since first intervening in this matter last summer, Mr. Chairman, I have heard from many consumers—not only from St. Louis but from widely separated parts of the Nation—supporting my view that the Federal meat grading program—including lamb grading—should be maintained and its integrity defended. Consumers first learned through the wartime price control programs to look for Federal grades in buying meat, and they still find the grades essential in obtaining fair value for their meat dollar. I will grant that tastes in meat are changing over the years and that many housewives no longer prefer to buy and pay for the high-fat-content prime grades of beef and lamb, but at least they want to have a basis for knowing and measuring the quality of the cuts they do select so that they are certain they are paying only for the quality of cut they are receiving.

The recent revelations of cheating in so many areas of our economy and society—mass, organized cheating often engaged in by respected, if not wholly respectable, business firms, and even by some industries on a broad basis—have emphasized to consumers the absolute necessity for keeping whatever reliable quality guides are available to them. Meat grading is a reliable guide of quality to the consumer. Consumers do not want to see it abandoned.

SMALL PACKERS NEED GRADING TO SURVIVE

And neither do the small packing firms which depend upon Federal grading as their means to compete with the big packers. You are all familiar with the way almost any product can be glamorized by packaging and advertising magic—and that is all right—but Federal grading of meat is the only sure guide the consumer can use to be sure of quality among a host of competing brand names and unbranded cuts. Having graded cuts is therefore the only way the small packer can market his meat in competition with the giants in the industry. This committee has gone to bat too often for the small packer and the small businessman to want to step aside now and allow the small packer to be denied the most important selling tool he has in order to compete with the big packers. As you know, grading does not cost the Federal Government or the Federal taxpayer a cent—it is paid for by the packer who chooses to utilize this service. And I think you have had testimony showing that on lamb, for instance, the prices to the consumer of comparable graded and ungraded cuts in the stores are often, if not usually, identical, indicating that the customer is not paying extra for this helpful service.

Certainly somebody is paying for it, and that somebody is the small packer, out of his profits. But at least he has profits—he is able to compete—because of the existence of this program. One might wonder why the big packers which are not using grading do not reflect the saving in their prices. But that is another story—another issue. Obviously, if grading were eliminated, the packers which do not at present use the service are not going to charge any less for their meat; on the contrary, if they can force out the small packers as competitors, you can be sure the price of lamb will go up.

MANY GROUPS HAVE PROTESTED DEPARTMENT ACTION

Last July, when the Department originally proposed abandoning the lamb grading program, about 1,000 firms, organizations and individuals wrote to the Department of Agriculture on this matter, and apparently the overwhelming majority supported the idea of continuing the program. At least, the Department so indicated in a press release at that time—reassuring those of us interested in the issue that the battle for the continuation of lamb grading had been won. The outpouring of consumer protests and of protests from small business firms directly involved in this matter was the more remarkable in that, up to then, practically nothing had appeared in the newspapers or on television about the Department's intention to end lamb grading. The newspapers in St. Louis had carried information on this, but very few others did.

Since then, the newspapers have become much more interested in this matter, so that today the consumer is alerted to the issue now facing this Committee. I can assure you therefore that if you take action to insist on a continuation of lamb grading it will be broadly supported in the country.

POST-DISPATCH EDITORIAL

Let me list a few of the comments I have received or seen on this:

The St. Louis Post-Dispatch commented editorially that—

"Chairman COOLEY of the House Agriculture Committee deserves the gratitude of consumers for intervening in the suspension of lamb and mutton grading."

Then, after giving the background of the issue, and citing Secretary Benson's decision to suspend grading because representatives of the various segments of the industry could not agree on changes proposed by the Department in the grading regulations, the Post-Dispatch editorial added:

"We imagine Representative COOLEY will want to know, as many consumers certainly do, why the Secretary did not perform the obvious administrative functions of enforcing a decision of his own until the industry could agree on a better. Such a course might still provide a healthy incentive to agreement."

ST. LOUIS CONSUMER FEDERATION PROTESTS

Consumer groups throughout the country have urged continuation of lamb grading. The St. Louis Consumer Federation, which is one of the outstanding organizations of its kind in the country—an alert and well-informed group of outstanding St. Louis residents—advised the Secretary of Agriculture as follows last month, in a letter from Mrs. J. M. Klamon, president:

"Our organization has learned that an order has been issued by your Department suspending lamb and mutton grading service for one year, effective January 4, 1960. The reason given in the press for this suspension is that the industry could not agree on standards. Industry interests, apparently, were the only ones considered; no mention is made of consumer interests.

"Our organization has fought for years to have grades placed on meats and other foods so consumers can buy intelligently. As you know, Federal standards for poultry were made effective only a few years ago.

"For the benefit of the consumers we urge that you reconsider the suspension of lamb and mutton grading. We find ourselves in agreement with those consumers who have already stated that they fear the suspension of lamb and mutton grading is only the first step toward removal of grading from beef.

"We feel that the solution of the problems now present in connection with lamb and mutton standards can be found while the grading program is in effect, and strongly protest the removal of grading from these products.

"We sincerely trust you will reconsider this entire matter for the protection of the consumer.

"Sincerely,

"MRS. J. M. KLAMON,
"President, St. Louis Consumer Federation."

MEAT DEALERS SUPPORT GRADING

Mr. Chairman, I received an equally emphatic letter on this same subject from the president of the Metropolitan St. Louis Meat Dealers' Association, Mr. Morrison McFarland, who points out the difficulty which would confront the small meat dealer if he personally had to grade and evaluate every piece of meat he buys—if he did not have reliable Federal grades to guide him—particularly on top quality meats destined for the hotel, restaurant, and institutional trade.

Even if each meat dealer had the time or the experienced personnel to grade in his own establishment each piece of meat he sold, so as to reassure the customer on quality, please keep in mind the fact that meat merchandising today is done largely through prepackaged meats put out for display in a refrigerated case. As Dorothy Diamond, the columnist on the woman's viewpoint for the magazine Printer's Ink put it in her column directed at people in the advertising and communications fields, "Now that the old-fashioned butcher who used to advise the housewife has become almost as elusive as the maid-of-all-work, and now that meat is sold increasingly in antiseptic prepackaged form, we housewives need and deserve all the help that we have been accustomed to getting from the Government." She makes a good point.

PROTEST TO SECRETARY BENSON

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I want to include in the record of your hearing the admittedly angry telegram I sent to Secretary Benson on this matter on December 9, immediately after hearing in a most roundabout fashion of the decision to suspend lamb grading. If you will recall, I had been very much interested in this matter when it first came to a head last July and had writen to him then and had placed a lot of material in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on this issue and so, in the normal course of things, I would expect to be notified when a decision of last July is suddenly changed in December. But I received no notification of the change in plans and when I did hear about it—in a roundabout manner—I reacted quite angrily, and sent the wire which I shall attach at the end of my statement. The wire was sent December 9. I received a polite answer to it from an Assistant Secretary on January 8. I shall not include the reply because I am sure you have received the identical information from the Department in these hearings.

But I would like my wire to be included, as follows:

DECEMBER 9, 1959.

Hon. EZRA TAFT BENSON,
Secretary of Agriculture,
Washington, D.C.

I have just learned in a fantastically roundabout manner that you have ordered suspension for 1 year, effective January 4, of U.S. Department of Agriculture lamb grading program which provides quality guidance to consumers. I bitterly protest not only the sudden about-face in the Department's position on this controversial matter but the quiet, unobtrusive, almost surreptitious manner in which the order has been promulgated within the Department without alerting consumers or even notifying those of us in Congress interested in this issue. In contrast, your decision last July 23 to continue the lamb grading program despite wishes of some industry groups was announced with great fanfare via a press conference and widespread news coverage. Consumers believed then the battle was won; apparently all they won was a short reprieve if your latest order stands.

As one who believes sincerely in the important role of meat grading by USDA in protecting consumers on the quality of the meat they buy, I protest what is obviously a surrender by your Department to a few powerful special interest groups which prefer to see the consumer flounder amid conflicting quality claims on meat rather than have clearly marked, federally certified grade standards which the consumer can follow in selecting meat purchases. Suspension of lamb grading appears to be the first step toward eliminating beef and other meat grading programs—programs which are completely self-supporting and operated at no cost to the taxpayer.

May I urge, in view of the long consideration given this matter prior to your decision of last July to continue lamb grading, that the suspension order for January 4 be rescinded. If lamb growers and some big packers believe changes should be made in grading criteria, let them come forward with intelligent, constructive suggestions, rather than be permitted to kill the program by their failure or refusal to agree on proposed changes. In giving in to their demands, I am sorry to say you have sold out the consumer completely.

Your action on this matter convinces me that programs established by Congress primarily to protect consumers rather than merely to aid sellers should be placed within departments which have at least a semblance of interest in the consumer's welfare. This action on lamb grading, coming on top of your ridicule of danger of using a prohibited, cancer-inducing weedkiller on cranberries, indicates the Department of Agriculture under present leadership is concerned only with the tinkling of the cash register on food sales with little or no interest in the quality, purity or value of the food the consumer buys. Is there any way I can state more strongly my dismay over the lamb-grading action, or my conviction that many consumer-important functions of the Department of Agriculture should be transferred to other agencies of Government?

LEONOR K. (MRS. JOHN B.) SULLIVAN,
Member of Congress, Third District, Missouri.

Mr. Speaker, that concludes the statement given to the committee. To complete the background, I now include as part of my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on this matter the reply I received from the Department of Agriculture to the above wire, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, D.C., January 8, 1960.

Hon. LEONOR K. SULLIVAN,
House of Representatives.

DEAR CONGRESSWOMAN SULLIVAN: This is in reply to your telegram dated December 9, 1959, to Secretary Benson, protesting the suspension of Federal grading of lamb and mutton for 1 year effective January 4, 1960, as announced by the Department in a press release December 2, 1959.

In evaluating the decision to suspend Federal lamb grading for 1 year, it is necessary to consider the history and sequence of events that prompted this action. The proposal was brought to the Department's attention by the National Wool Growers Association which adopted a resolution on January 29, 1959, stating the Federal grading was detrimental to the efficient merchandising of lamb and urging that the Department suspend Federal lamb grading immediately. The National Lamb Feeders Association had adopted a similar resolution on January 10, 1959.

In view of the widespread interest in this subject, the Department called a meeting on April 17, 1959, of individuals representing various organizations, from producers to retailers, who were directly concerned with the merchandising of lamb. Based upon the statements presented at that meeting, it appeared that the entire industry should have an opportunity to comment on this situation prior to the Department taking any action to discontinue lamb grading. Consequently, notice was published in the Federal Register on May 28, 1959, announcing that the Department of Agriculture was considering the suspension of lamb grading on August 1, 1959, and inviting all interested parties to submit comments by June 22, 1959. At the request of certain segments of the industry, the time for submitting comments was extended until July 6, 1959, and was again extended until July 20, 1959, as requested by Hon. JAMES ROOSEVELT, chairman, Subcommittee No. 5, Select Committee on Small Business, House of Representatives.

During this period for filing comments there was ample opportunity for the entire industry to express its views on this subject. After considering comments of more than 1,000 organizations and individuals, and weighing the matter carefully, the Department issued a press release on July 23, 1959, announcing that Federal lamb grading would be continued and stating that the Department would proceed promptly to consider revised grade standards for lamb and mutton to eliminate any deficiencies in the present standards. At that time it was stated that "If improved grade standards for lamb and mutton are not developed to meet more adequately the needs of the industry the Department will give further consideration to suspension of Federal grading of lamb and mutton carcasses." Following that announcement, Department officials met with an industry group at Kansas City on August 26, 1959. Representatives from all segments of the industry from producers to consumers attended this meeting and advised the Department concerning the objectives to be accomplished in revising the standards. General agreement was reached on the principle of the revision which was to lower the requirements for the two highest grades, Prime and Choice, with the objective of sufficient volume within each of these grades for effective merchandising.

Following the meeting of the general group, the Department met with a technical committee of eight members selected to advise on the techniques of effectuating the changes which were to be proposed. This group met again on September 16 to review the tentative proposals which the Department had developed. At this meeting the technical committee indicated its general agreement with the objectives of the grade standards and final grades placed on demonstration lambs in accordance with the new standards. However, six of the eight members of the committee strongly objected to the use of interior carcass indications of quality in determining grade. The Department maintained the position that the standards should contain all indicators of quality necessary to accomplish a precise evaluation of grade. It was pointed out that without the consideration of internal indications of quality in determining gradelines the Department graders would not be able to maintain a satisfactory degree of uniformity in grading. In view of this, the Department proposed these standards on October 21, 1959. Comments concerning these proposals were received through November 21, 1959, and clearly indicated a substantial lack of agreement within the lamb industry. Consequently, on December 2, 1959, it was announced that Federal lamb grading would be suspended for 1 year and hope was expressed that representative groups in the industry would make every effort to resolve their differences in order to propose a generally acceptable plan for the Department's consideration.

Since issuing this statement, the Department has received numerous comments and we have met with a large number of representatives of producers, consumers, and industry interested in this subject to hear their position regarding this action. In addition, the chairman of the House Agriculture Committee, Hon. HAROLD D. COOLEY, requested that the suspension of Federal grading of lamb and mutton be delayed so as to permit his committee an opportunity to become more fully acquainted with the problem. In respecting his request, the Department announced on December 30, 1959, that the decision on this matter is being withheld for a period up to 1 month (not later than February 8, 1960). A copy of the press release explaining this action is enclosed.

Thank you for forwarding comments for consideration. Your views and suggestions are always welcome and your interest in the Federal meat grading program is appreciated.

Sincerely yours,

CLARENCE L. MILLER,
Assistant Secretary.

Almost Respectable

OF
HON. CHARLES O. PORTER
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, January 14, 1960

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, more and more people are coming to realize that practicality and reason, if not survival itself, require resumption of communication with the governing entity of the 600 million Chinese people who live on the mainland of China. While at one time a suggestion of this kind would have elicited tacit, if not outspoken, accusations of near treason, some of our most respected leaders are now advocating it without incurring any thought that they are disloyal. One of those who is speaking out on the subject is the distinguished Senator from Ohio, STEPHEN M. YOUNG.

Under a previous consent, I am including excerpts from his newsletter, "Straight From Washington," of November and December 1959:

RED CHINA

Thought should be given and, very likely, action taken early in the year to bring about increased communications with Red China and opening trade between that nation and ours. Then the question of recognizing the government of Red China may be given consideration. Of course, recognition of any de facto government does not at all mean that this Nation approves of that form of government. Practical considerations are persuasive in connection with doing business with Red China. For one thing, how can we definitely stop testing of nuclear weapons under a plan for international inspection unless the government of Red China agrees to allow control stations within her borders? We are not advocating appeasement, softness or concessions to Red China, but why not start this troubled world on the road to disarmament with adequate safeguards to compel real disarmaments?

PENETRATE THE CURTAIN

We, in this Nation, have had no definite foreign policy since the good neighbor policy of Cordell Hull 25 years ago. It is important that we find some way to establish friendlier relations with Red China. We should penetrate that bamboo curtain and permit American newsmen, businessmen, tourists and students to visit that country and permit Red Chinese nationals to visit this country, under severe restrictions, of course. Were we to engage in some trade with Red China, we in this Nation would gain from that. Furthermore, we cannot ignore that nation of 600 million people. We have no intention of abandoning Taiwan (Formosa), as our frontier there and the maintenance of bases are important to us and to the free world. Nevertheless, Chiang Kai-shek is merely a symbol. He knows that the Communist regime is well entrenched in the Chinese mainland. Furthermore, 35 percent of 640,000 Nationalist soldiers are Formosans. The youngest and best soldiers of the Nationalist Army have never seen the Chinese mainland. As Formosans, they desire freedom for their country. They have no patricular liking for Chiang Kai-shek. The force is entirely too small anyway for a successful invasion of the Chinese mainland, unless American air, sea and military might spearheads the drive. Chiang Kai-shek himself knows that he is talking as a politician and boasting as a warlord when he speaks of invading the Chinese mainland. This has been going on for 10 years, and the prospects of his meeting with success are nil. No revolt in Red China could possibly succeed unless elements of the Red Army revolted. The peasants have no arms or munitions. Were any section of the Red Army to revolt, and of course there is no indication of that, then that Commander would be the new No. 1 boy, and General Chiang would be definitely out even as a symbol.

Veterans Day Program, Altoona, Pa., November 11, 1959

OF
HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, January 14, 1960

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, veterans' organizations in Altoona, Pa., under General Chairman Lt. Col. Harold J. Pegg, joined in the annual Veterans Day observance held November 11, 1959.

A parade through the business district preceded the memorial service to all veterans. The program was held in front of the Altoona City Hall, at which time I had the privilege of delivering the following address:

ADDRESS BY REPRESENTATIVE JAMES E. VAN ZANDT, MEMBER OF CONGRESS, 20TH DISTRICT OF PENNSYLVANIA, AT THE VETERANS DAY PROGRAM, ALTOONA, PA., NOVEMBER 11, 1959

Once again it is my privilege to join with my fellow veterans and the citizens of my hometown in observing Veterans Day, a day of tribute to those who have served in the Armed Forces of the United States.

In preparing my remarks for this occasion, I could not help but recall the great contribution made by thousands of men and women from this area who have worn the uniform of their country in all of America's wars, from the Revolutionary War to the end of the Korean conflict.

It is not difficult to understand the deep love of country that has been characteristic of the manhood and womanhood of this area, because its history reveals that early settlers were deeply religious, with the result that love of God and country were their outstanding characteristics.

Today the many beautiful churches in our midst are eloquent testimonials of the faith and devotion of God-fearing and liberty-loving Americans that inhabit this area.

The sponsors of this Veterans Day program are the veterans organizations of Altoona, all of which serve a common purpose, namely, to promote love of God and country and to provide a means for war veterans to foster and preserve the ideals for which they served in the Nation's wars.

As we observe Veterans Day this year we are reminded that 41 years have passed since this Nation paused at 11 o'clock on the morning of November 11, 1918.

This hour and date marked the end of World War I and for years was observed as Armistice Day.

November 11 has been designated by Congress in recent years as Veterans Day.

Today we commemorate the services of those from this area who fought in all the wars in which our country has been engaged.

Our few minutes today are dedicated to this noble purpose—the commemoration of the patriotic service of all veterans.

The presence of our respected veterans on this occasion, and the entire purpose of this part of the program makes it very necessary that we seriously consider how the average citizen can assist in our efforts to keep the cold war from turning into a conflict which would destroy the very foundations of our civilization.

Missiles and nuclear bombs are in themselves no menace to mankind, nor are the "conventional" weapons which can inflict widespread destruction.

The menace is the man who, in disregard of the wishes of his people, can order the trigger pulled.

The one big danger in the world, therefore, as David Lawrence recently stated, is one-man rule—autocratic government.

Our opponents are strong—this we must admit.

To avoid facing such a fact is nothing less than cowardly.

The square mile area of the Soviet Union is greater than that of the United States by over 5 million square miles.

The population of the Soviet Union exceeds that of the United States by 33 million persons.

The military manpower picture of the Soviet Union is greater than ours by over 1 million men.

It is significant that between 1954 and 1955 trade between the Communist countries and the rest of the world rose from $3.6 billion to $4.46 billion—an increase of 24 percent.

Afghanistan, Egypt, Finland, Hong Kong, Iceland, Iran, Turkey, and Yugoslavia all increased their trade with the Communist world by 10 percent or more.

It is recalled that in 1956 the Communist bloc extended $600 million in credits to Yugoslavia, Egypt, Afghanistan, and India.

In addition, Russian trade with Communist China increased $200 million between 1954 and 1955.

Then too, Russia is building a million-ton steel mill in central India on "generous credit and repayment terms."

We used to think that the economy of a slave state could never be as productive as a free one.

We must now revise this belief.

Within a recent 12-month period, the leaders of the Kremlin made trade agreements with 11 countries.

During that same period the United States did not sign a single agreement.

Mr. Khrushchev has been—for some months now—calling for the end of the cold war.

This is no recent request.

In February of this year he boasted that "economic competition was now enough to win the world to communism."

During his recent visit to the United States, he repeated his views on the Russian economy in no uncertain terms.

We have been warned from several sources that we must choose now between teamwork and dictation or the freedom of choice may be taken away from us.

Leaders in Government, in business, in labor, must stop fighting small battles among themselves and present a united front—a truly United States of America against our known adversary—world communism.

The director of our Central Intelligence Agency in Washington, D.C., Allen W. Dulles, tells us that in addition to its worldwide penetration through Communist Party organizations, the Communists in Moscow and Peiping have set up a whole series of front organizations to penetrate all segments of life in the free countries of the world.

Mr. Dulles says these include the world federation of trade unions, which claim some 90 million members throughout the world.

International organizations of youth and students stage great festivals at frequent intervals.

Last summer they met in Vienna, and it was the first time they dared to meet outside of the Iron Curtain.

They have the Women's International Democratic Federation, the World Federation of Teachers Unions, the International Association of Democratic Lawyers; Communist journalists and medical organizations.

Then cutting across professional and social lines, the Communists have created the world peace council which is designed to appeal to intellectuals and which maintains so-called peace committees in 47 countries, gaining adherents by trading on the magic world of peace.

Mr. Dulles gives us additional pertinent facts, which I quote as follows:

"To back up this massive apparatus, the Soviet has the largest number of trained agents for espionage and secret political action that any country has ever assembled.

"In Moscow, Prague, and Peiping and other Communist centers, they are training agents recruited from scores of other countries to go out as missionaries of communism into the troubled areas of the world."

Continuing, CIA Director Dulles said:

"Much of the Middle East and southeast Asia, and particularly black Africa, are high on their target list.

"They do not neglect this hemisphere as recent disclosures of Communist plotting in Mexico show us."

Concluding, he said, "Their basic purpose is to destroy all existing systems of free and democratic government and disrupt the economic and political organizations on which these are based.

"Behind their Iron Curtain they ruthlessly suppress all attempts to achieve more freedom—witness Hungary and now Tibet."

Ladies and gentlemen, under the heading of subversion we must not overlook the fact that the Communist leaders have sought to advance their cause through local wars by proxy.

In this connection, Korea, Vietnam, Malaya are typical examples.

One of the important aspects of the cold war is the way in which it shortens the time one can take to learn about the world into which we are moving.

Throughout the history of our country—and until the past 25 years—it was possible to allow time for the development of understanding of the inherent process of our society.

Now no such allowance of time can be made because of the hot war threat which would bring death itself.

In simple language—the business at hand is survival itself—there is no time to find out the why and wherefore.

Perhaps the answer to our vexing problem is a more positive stand on the issues—or delving even deeper, perhaps we need a firm reappraisal of the issues themselves.

Dean C. Ken Weidner of the American University of Beirut has pointed out that many thoughtful Europeans feel that in the United States we still do not understand that the Russians have devised a new kind of war.

He points out that instead of seeking out the enemy's forces and destroying them, the Russian approach is to maneuver and encourage the enemy to destroy himself by exhausting his natural resources and dissipating his wealth and power in countering widely scattered military threats.

Meanwhile, he says all the time the Russian ideology is being sold to the people of the United States from within our own borders.

Eminent philosophers and statesmen of our Nation have in the past warned that our kind of system cannot be destroyed from without, but can be destroyed from within our own Nation.

Mark you, there is no prescription for a quick and easy peace.

We must expect periods during which world tensions will flare up, quiet down, and then break out again.

Therefore, we must strive constantly to narrow the gap between the differences in our world.

We must earnestly seek an answer to the questions: What can I do to help solve the issues?

What can I do to help the problems from becoming worse and worse?

It was in this spirit of earnestly seeking peace that Premier Khrushchev was invited to visit the United States.

On this Veterans Day as we attempt to briefly evaluate the cold-war picture, we may safely conclude that much of our defense lies in understanding and firmness, in a strong and ready deterrent military power, in the marshaling of our economic assets with those of other free countries.

This was the picture we sought to convey to Premier Khrushchev in the hope he would not continue to underestimate our desire or our ability to continue to strive for a just and lasting peace.

As liberty-loving Americans, if we are to fulfill our obligations to the veterans of past wars—if we are to keep that faith we talk about on every Veterans Day—we must widen the streams of freedom that flow through our world.

"Life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," that is the way one great American historic document spelled out the needs of the time.

Self-government and respect for the rights of man are ideals deeply cherished by the peoples of America since their earliest days.

Drawing upon their common belief in the dignity of man—based on their Christian heritage—our Founding Fathers were inspired to lay the foundations of a new nation.

Although from time to time the achievement of our goals has encountered obstacles and setbacks, we have never wavered in our determination to press forward.

We have maintained our political system which is designed to uphold American principles and to guarantee human dignity.

Ladies and gentlemen, we should not lose sight of our purpose in opening our doors to the leaders of the Soviet Union, any more than we should lose sight of the purpose of our Founding Fathers when they drafted the Declaration of Independence and the Bill of Rights.

It is important in our personal and national conduct during the cold war that we not become so embroiled in the conflicting ideologies of the present, that we forget to draw upon the past for our inspiration.

We must not forget to remind ourselves our purpose is upholding the dignity of the individual.

It is not a fly-by-night ideal—but one basic to a continuation of free society.

If we wish to maintain faith in ourselves and in the values our free society embodies, we must understand what this faith is and how it came to earlier generations.

Every civilization is cradled in some religion.

The culture of China is unthinkable without the philosophy of Confucius.

Indian society is the expression of Hinduism.

Islam is composed of followers of Mohammed.

In like fashion, our Western culture stems from the Judeo-Christian tradition.

We are a branch of Christendom.

Our Declaration of Independence sets forth the conviction that political liberty is part of the covenant between a man and his Maker.

The American dream was built upon a religious foundation.

If liberty and freedom are our commitments, then we have no choice except to stand for those principles.

We cannot sacrifice those principles and expect to lessen the gap that is caused by the cold war.

Only when peoples are able, in free elections, to choose their leaders and to remove them at will can there be an assurance of peace in the world.

People do not make wars—but dictators do.

November 11, 1918, was a day of rejoicing in the United States.

The meaning of that day seemed so simple.

Right had triumphed; aggression had been put down; men could and would again live together in peace.

Armies could be disbanded; ships converted to the uses of peaceful commerce.

Indeed, there were not enough swords to make all the needed plowshares.

In 1918 there was little boastful triumph in our mood.

It was not the celebration of a military victory—it was a spontaneous hymn of joy to the fortunes of peace.

Today it is not the victory of that war that we remember.

Because since the first Armistice Day we have learned that there can be no enduring victory.

Meanwhile, we ask ourselves, "what of those who have sacrificed their all."

"What of those we especially honor on this Veterans Day program."

Perhaps those of us who wore the uniform of our country and breathed the essence of comradeship-in-arms as we saw the naked spirit face the peril of wars can give the words for the tribute we are groping for today.

It is said that men who live for freedom will die for freedom.

We are told to contemplate such sacrifice in true perspective.

And we are told that it is better to have even a brief vision of the stars from the vantage point of free men than to have a spirit dulled by the futile routine of communistic oppression until the eyes can no longer be lifted upward.

May God grant that the memory of those brave men and women whose patriotic service has enshrined them in the hearts of all Americans—and whom we honor here today—will serve as an inspiration to us in the great task before us of preserving our priceless heritage of liberty and freedom.

Fidel Castro: America's Achilles Heel

OF

HON. H. ALLEN SMITH

OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 14, 1960

Mr. SMITH of California. Mr. Speaker, not since the days of Teddy Roosevelt's Rough Riders has Cuba been more on the minds of Americans. With the suddenness of a black thunderhead rolling up in the summer sky, a young revolutionary, Fidel Castro, swept to power last January in this lovely Caribbean island. Since then, like a tempestuous volcano, Castro has been strewing revolutionary lava far and wide. Most alarmingly, some of his deeds and words sound suspiciously like the tactics of communism. More and more, as Americans learn about the Cuban revolution, they are shocked by the increasing Communist infiltration and, in some areas, Communist guidance. These facts must give America great care lest Cuba become a Soviet stronghold on our very doorstep.

To most Americans, Fidel Castro must appear as a fascinating character. Young, gay and handsome, his bearded face brings memories of a young Daniel Boone. An intelligent, jolly fellow, he always seems ready for a good time. Perhaps most appealing, he gives the impression of an allegiance to an ideal—the 26th of July Movement, the name of his revolutionary party. Always we admire a man supposedly dedicated to an ideal—especially a man who has the vigor, enthusiasm and determination to carry forward its principles. Admittedly, Fidel Castro possesses leadership qualities which have made him a towering figure in his homeland.

The question before America today is simply this: Which way does Fidel Castro tower? Does he lean toward democratic ideals—the ideals which gave his country freedom, the ideals which brought Americans as liberators to his shores in 1898, the ideals which made America and Cuba friendly neighbors? Or does he lean toward totalitarian precepts—the precepts which destroy liberty and justice and would make his country a captive of international communism? That is America's chief interest in Castro.

We are all familiar with the background of Fidel Castro—how, as a young student, he led a revolt on July 26, 1953, against the Batista government, how he was arrested, sent to prison, later released. That was just the beginning for this young man. He went to Mexico, organized a band of revolutionaries and vowed to overthrow the Havana government. The very term "26th of July Movement" comes from the historic date in 1953 when Castro made his fateful attack against Moncada Barracks in Santiago.

Then one December day in 1956, Castro with only some 80 men actually invaded Cuba. This act in itself shows the daring fearlessness of this man—who with a mere handful of followers would attempt a military invasion of a sovereign American Republic. Castro's expedition met with resistance at the shore and only some dozen members, including Castro, escaped inland. The stage was now set for one of the most ingenious, swift, and amazingly successful coups in the whole history of the Western Hemisphere. In just a few months these dozen men, through terror, cajolery, and blind devotion to a revolutionary program, mushroomed into a tremendous military force. From a shadowy silhouette figure hurriedly slithering ashore from a small boat to a grand Cuban conquistador cheered by thousands as he parades down the streets of Cuba's capital city—that was the transformation of Fidel Castro in roughly 2 years.

There is a lesson here to be learned. Castro's success shows the tremendous power which can be generated by a fanatic minority determined to overthrow a legitimate government. Lenin and his henchmen did the same in 1917. A mere handful of Bolsheviks, trained in deceit and revolutionary techniques, overthrew the mighty, centuries-old governmental structure of the czar. They then went on—after brutally murdering the czar and his family—to erect a revolutionary Communist government. The world is still reaping the bitter fruits of that fateful event.

To the victor belong the spoils—such has been the motto of dictators for countless centuries. Castro heaped upon himself the honors and rewards which came from victory. He promised reforms. He promised new laws. He promised to do away with injustices. Many Americans were highly sympathetic as it must be admitted there was much room for improvement in Cuba.

But when victory is achieved by a revolutionary minority through military means, there inevitably come the abuses of power. We remember the infamous treason trials, held in a virtual circus atmosphere. Human beings were sent to death—almost like cattle in a slaughterhouse. The name "La Cabana"—the hated fortress where prisoners were jailed—leaped into the headlines. Many hundreds fled Cuba as political exiles. These are the familiar trappings of the dictator state: "treason" trials, prisons, political exiles.

Yet, there was much good will still left for Fidel Castro. Last April, as you will remember, he toured the United States. Virtually everywhere he was received with enthusiasm. He spoke before many audiences of political leaders, newspapermen, civic officials, students. He told what he was trying to do in Cuba. He tried to explain away the excesses of the revolution. He denied his movement was Communist. "We have said very clearly we are not Communists, very clearly." He espoused friendship for our country. He said he was bringing a new life to millions of his fellow countrymen.

Now, some 9 months later, the time has come to take a serious inventory of Fidel Castro. I know some people are downright weary trying to figure out just what is occurring in this historic isle—where Christopher Columbus traveled on his first expedition to America. One day Castro resigns as Prime Minister—then upon the appeal of the people, returns. Invasions of Cuba occur while Cuba invades the Dominican Republic. The President of the state resigns under fire and another is appointed—both mere puppets of Castro. Special tricks are used to lure airplanes to the island—there to be captured. A high-ranking Cuban official, Maj. Pedro Luis Lanz, chief of the air force, suddenly disappears—is denounced by Castro—and then testifies before an American congressional committee. These 9 months have been marked by a kaleidoscope array of confusing incidents, bewildering to anybody who does not take the time to study the pattern of developments in this country.

And what we see is not encouraging. Castro's Cuba, from all indications, is rapidly falling under Communist influence. Whether Fidel Castro himself is a Communist is not known. Major Lanz was asked during his appearance before the Senate Internal Security Subcommittee as to who was the "strongest Communist in the Castro government." He replied, "I think it is Fidel himself. I am completely sure he is a Communist."

Major Lanz added, "While fighting in the hills we talked about bringing democracy back to Cuba, about free election, about the constitution. What have we got now? He has let the Communists have control, and few Cubans are Communists."

Evidence continues to mount of Communist infiltration and control in Cuba. Intelligent observers have pointed out that there are Communists in the Army, labor unions and public communications. Likewise, Cuban education is being penetrated by the Communists, even to the extent of rewriting history books. Reports continue to circulate of contacts by Cubans with Communists from other countries.

Most important are the close advisers of Fidel Castro. His brother, Raul, is one of the most prominent. Raul reportedly was in attendance at a Communist-directed youth rally in Vienna in 1953, later traveling behind the Iron Curtain As commander of the Cuban armed forces, Raul is in a most strategic position. His friendliness to Marxist-Leninist propaganda is obviously giving the Communists an entree into new fields of Cuban life.

Then there is Ernesto "Che" Guevara, the so-called No. 3 man of the Castro regime. Argentine born, an international adventurer, always ready to fight at the drop of a hat, he has become Fidel Castro's right-hand man. He led part of Castro's army in its bloody struggle for power, later served as commander of the infamous La Cabana fortress. He, too, reportedly has intense Communist leanings and has long been regarded as one of the key party figures in the Caribbean area. A man like Guevara—bold, dashing and ruthless—is not one who would be expected to fight for democratic liberties. He is a promoter of dictatorship.

The handwriting is clear for all who are willing to observe—Cuba is well on the road toward Communist domination. Perhaps Castro himself is not to become Cuba's Lenin—the man who actually sets up the Communist dictatorship. We do not know; perhaps Castro will be a Kerensky, the man who was to briefly head the Russian Government after the czar's forced abdication in March 1917, only in turn to be replaced by Lenin the following November. The important thing is this: anti-American, anti-democratic, anti-liberty forces are on the rampage in Cuba at this very minute. Communism is growing there. Our fear is that the Kremlin will gain either overt or covert control, swinging this lovely tropical island into the Kremlin's control. This, I say, America can never permit.

There are some people who say give Castro time to straighten out affairs. That advice would be excellent, if only the possibility existed that democratic processes might gain the ascendancy. But the whole flavor of the July 26 movement and Fidel Castro personally militate against this prospect.

First of all, there is the fact that Castro gained power through bloody military revolt, not democratic elections. He thinks in terms of ruthless military force—witness his handling of the "treason" trials and those who criticize his regime. "From now on the symbol of our revolution," he told a cheering throng on resuming the Premiership, "will be the machete," the razor-sharp ax used by Cubans. Seldom has history recorded that a military dictator has become a believer in democracy.

Then, in 9 months, the trends are all running contrary to free government: there have been no free elections; establishment of responsible local self-government; no operation of an independent judiciary. Attempts have been made to interfere with the free press. Property has been expropriated without due process of law. Then there is the continual atmosphere of emotion, Castro-sponsored rallies and parades designed to whip the people into frenized acclaim—the familiar trappings of the dictator.

Castro, moreover, is attempting to churn discontent and revolt among his Caribbean neighbors. He has become a firebrand threatening to inflame the peace of Latin America. He talks and acts like a bully, forgetting that nations must learn to live peacefully. If disputes arise, they should be settled amicably—not by name calling, guerrilla invasions, and subversive infiltration. Castro is running contrary to the principles of Western Hemisphere unity.

When the Cuban jig-saw puzzle is put together, piece by piece, we find a man—Fidel Castro—and a group—26th of July Movement—which are basically anti-democratic. This young man, trained to think in terms of violent revolution and dictatorship, represents a severe danger to the United States. As Communist influence grows, as the Kremlin increases in power in Cuba, we must be alert to protect our national security. Let's make no mistake: Fidel Castro is the Achilles heel of our national security. We cannot allow Moscow to gain a foothold too close to our shoreline.

SENATE

MONDAY, JANUARY 18, 1960

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, our merciful Father, whose faithfulness abides in spite of all our fickleness, whose forgiveness outlasts all our transgressions, take from our darkened minds, we pray, the delusions which so often color our judgments and control our verdicts.

May we know that in all the confusions and perplexities of these days, which so sorely test our powers of discernment, at best we but see as through a glass darkly. Keep us from mistaking one ray of light for the total sun.

We dare to ask for light upon only one step ahead, faith to take 1 day at a time, endurance in the darkness to wait in patience and confidence for the dawn.

May we be loyal to all the truth we know and seek, and, with scorn of all expediency, may we discharge faithfully the duties which lay their commission upon our conscience.

We ask it in the dear Redeemer's name. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, January 14, 1960, was dispensed with.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

THE BUDGET—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT (H. DOC. NO. 255)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States relating to the budget for the year 1961, which, with the accompanying documents, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

(For President's message, see House proceedings of today.)

REPORT OF NATIONAL SCIENCE FOUNDATION—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT (H. DOC. NO. 300)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare:

To the Congress of the United States:

Pursuant to the provisions of Public Law 507, 81st Congress, I transmit herewith the Ninth Annual Report of the National Science Foundation for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1959.

DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 18, 1960.

DIRECTOR OF GALLAUDET COLLEGE

The VICE PRESIDENT. In accordance with the provisions of 68 Stat. 265, the Chair appoints the Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR] a Director of Gallaudet College to fill the vacancy created by the retirement from the Senate of Hon. Edward J. Thye, of Minnesota.

LIMITATION OF DEBATE DURING MORNING HOUR

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, under the rule, there will be the usual morning hour; and I ask unanimous consent that statements in connection with the presentation of memorials, the introduction of bills, and the submission of other related matters, be limited to 3 minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

COMMITTEE MEETING DURING SENATE SESSION

On request of Mr. MANSFIELD, and by unanimous consent, the Committee on Rules and Administration was authorized to meet during the session of the Senate today.

AUTHORIZATION FOR COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS TO MEET DURING SESSIONS OF THE SENATE

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, on behalf of the Committee on Appropriations, I ask unanimous consent that the committee be authorized to meet during the sessions of the Senate for the remainder of the present session of Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AUTHORITY FOR COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS TO REPORT DURING ADJOURNMENTS OR RECESSES OF THE SENATE

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that during adjournments or recesses of the Senate during the 2d session of the 86th Congress, the Committee on Appropriations be, and it is hereby, authorized to report appropriation bills, including joint resolutions, with accompanying notices of motions to suspend paragraph 4 of rule 16 for the purpose of offering certain amendments to such bills or joint resolutions, which proposed amendments shall be printed. This is the customary request which is made on behalf of the Committee on Appropriations early in each session of the Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER DISPENSING WITH CALL OF THE CALENDAR

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the call of the calendar be dispensed with.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I should like to announce that we plan a Democratic caucus for Wednesday, at 10:30 a.m., in the room in which we have previously held our caucuses, for the purpose of discussing the education bill which appears on the calendar, and is Order No. 1049, Senate bill 8, introduced by the Senators from Michigan [Mr. McNAMARA and Mr. HART]. It is a bill to authorize an emergency 2-year program of Federal financial assistance in school construction to the States.

I announce that we expect to follow the unfinished business—which is Calendar No. 571, Senate bill 2436, to revise the Federal election laws, to prevent corrupt practices in Federal elections, and for other purposes—with Calendar No. 559, Senate Joint Resolution 39, to amend the Constitution to authorize Governors to fill temporary vacancies in the House of Representatives. That joint resolution was introduced by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER]. I am informed that amendments will be offered to that measure—including an amendment known as the so-called poll tax amendment, and perhaps others.

When the Senate completes its action on the unfinished business, Senate bill 2436, I expect the Senate also to take action on Calendar No. 819, Senate bill 694, introduced by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL] and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK]. That is a bill to provide Federal assistance for projects which will demonstrate or develop techniques and practices leading to a solution of the Nation's juvenile delinquency control problems.

Furthermore, a number of other bills have been cleared by the policy committee; and announcement about them has previously been made to the public. These bills will be called up at appropriate times. I do not mean to indicate that they will be called up in order in which I have announced them.

I should like to have all Members know that the proposed constitutional amendment measure, the juvenile delinquency bill, and the Democratic caucus on the State aid to education bill, have been scheduled, and that we plan to follow the disposition of the unfinished business with some of those measures.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following letters, which were referred as indicated:

A letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, pursuant to law, a draft of contract relating to proposed construction work exceeding a total cost of $200,000, on the Talent Division of the Rogue River Basin project, Oregon (with an accompanying paper); to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

FINANCIAL REPORT OF MILITARY ORDER OF THE PURPLE HEART

A letter from the national commander, Military Order of the Purple Heart, Daytona Beach, Fla., transmitting, pursuant to law, the financial report of that order, for the fiscal year, August 1, 1958 to July 31, 1959 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on the Judiciary.

DISSOLUTION OF MILITARY ORDER OF THE PURPLE HEART

A letter from the national commander, Military Order of the Purple Heart, Daytona Beach, Fla., confirming the final dissolution and liquidation of the Military Order of the Purple Heart, Inc., formerly incorporated under the laws of the State of New Jersey; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORT ON POSITIONS FILLED IN CERTAIN GRADES OF CLASSIFICATION ACT OF 1949

A letter from the Director of Personnel, Department of Commerce, reporting, pursuant to law, a report on positions filled under the Classification Act of 1949 in grades GS–16, GS–17, and GS–18; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Petitions, etc., were laid before the Senate, or presented, and referred as indicated:

By the VICE PRESIDENT:

A telegram in the nature of a petition from Mary Braun of Chicago, Ill., relating to the resurgence of nazism; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

RESOLUTION OF UNITED STATES SAVINGS AND LOAN LEAGUE

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, at the annual convention of the United States Savings and Loan League, held in Dallas, Tex., last November, the league adopted a resolution on the subject of "Preserving a Sound American Dollar."

In this resolution the league recognizes that the management of the public debt is closely related to the battle for a stable dollar and expresses concern over the fact that the present 4¼-percent interest rate ceiling on long-term marketable Treasury obligations is adding an ever-increasing burden to the cost of financing our Government obligations.

The United States Savings and Loan League is entitled to much credit for its statesmanlike stand on this important issue.

Congress has a very definite responsibility in this field and I sincerely hope we can get legislative action that will permit our Government to finance its obligations on a long-term basis and eliminate the 4¼-percent limit on interest rates that may be charged on long-term bonds.

I present the resolution and ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD and referred to the appropriate committee.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PRESERVING A SOUND AMERICAN DOLLAR

During the past year the present administration and many Members of the Congress have intensified their efforts to preserve the integrity of the American dollar. Their insistence on fiscal responsibility on the part of the Federal Government was a primary factor in making a balanced Federal budget for the fiscal year 1960 a confident expectation. The United States Savings and Loan League commends the President and these Members of Congress for their unwavering efforts to improve the status of the American dollar abroad and to preserve its buying power at home.

The league recognizes that the management of the public debt is closely related to the battle for a stable dollar; it also recognizes that such management is a particularly serious problem to the Treasury in a period of rising demand for credit from all sectors of the economy. The league urges upon its member savings and loan institutions continued active assistance to the U.S. Treasury by participation in the sale of savings bonds, through which many thousands of persons are started on the path to thrift.

It is obvious that the present 4¼-percent interest rate ceiling on long-term marketable Treasury obligations should be eliminated. This limitation has not prevented interest rates from rising, nor has it prevented the Treasury from paying more than 4¼ percent for money. On the contrary, the ceiling has the unfortunate effect at the present time of forcing the Treasury to concentrate its bond offerings in maturities under 5 years, has imposed an abnormal pressure on the short-term securities market, and has forced the Treasury into an unprecedented competition with thrift institutions which seems likely to result in a decrease in funds available for home mortgage loans next year.

The league recognizes that earlier in the decade of the 1950's—before the 4¼-percent ceiling became a barrier—the Treasury did not move frequently and decisively toward placing more of the debt on a long-term basis. Its policy of continually refunding on a short-term basis contributed to the present difficult situation the Treasury now faces. Fortunately, the Treasury now gives every indication of being wise and courageous enough to pursue a policy of long-term financing.

The U.S. Savings and Loan League urges that the 86th Congress, when it reconvenes in January, promptly enact legislation raising the present ceiling on long-term Treasury obligations.

DISASTER RELIEF BY A "GREAT WHITE FLEET"—COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, the whole free world was delighted with the enthusiastic reception which the President received on his visit to other countries last month. Nothing has done more than has this visit to promote good will and friendship among the nations. The reception accorded President Eisenhower on his trip proved dramatically that a just and lasting peace is uppermost in the minds of the people everywhere.

While the results of the President's trip abroad were indeed momentous, other ways to implement our efforts for world peace can be effective, and can be carried out with comparatively little cost.

One project which would have very great value is the sending of a fleet, without guns, to carry medical supplies, food, clothing, and other emergency assistance to the victims of disaster in near and far parts of the world.

On July 21 of last year, I joined with the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] in submitting Senate Concurrent Resolution 66, urging the President to provide for the establishment of a Great White Fleet to carry emergency assistance to people stricken by famine, disease, earthquakes, floods, or other disasters.

Subsequently, 31 other Members of the Senate became cosponsors of the resolution. The same resolution was offered in the House by Representative BATES, of Massachusetts, and Representative EDMONDSON, of Oklahoma.

The effect of the submission of the resolution was not only gratifying, but also rather startling. I received thousands of letters from people in every State, as well as many mailed on shipboard and from foreign countries, urging the establishment of this mercy fleet, and offering moral and material support for this purpose. In fact, I have had to return to the writers nearly $1,000 which they wanted to contribute to the cause.

Much of the credit for this outstanding response was due to an article and endorsement by Life magazine.

I had hoped that the administration would take the lead in pushing this project, without further urging by the Congress.

The very fact that our Nation would be prepared to cope with disaster wherever it might occur would give hope and encouragement to people everywhere.

We already have the necessary ships, lying idle; and it is my firm belief that the expenditure of $5 million in establishing such a Great White Fleet would make a greater contribution to understanding among nations and the establishment of a lasting peace than an additional $5 billion spent for instruments of destruction.

Since several months have gone by, and since there appears to be no move on the part of the executive branch to take any further steps toward the establishment of the Great White Fleet, I am turning over today to the chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee the several thousand communications which I have received in support of Senate Concurrent Resolution 66; and I urge that the Senate go on record as favoring this proposal.

I submit the communications, and ask that they be referred to the Committee on Armed Services.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont yield?

Mr. AIKEN. I yield.

Mr. BRIDGES. Would it be possible and also very practical to take the $5 million from perhaps the foreign-aid funds which have not already been specifically committed? I think the idea of such disaster relief is a very worthy one, as a positive contribution to worldwide understanding and good will.

Mr. AIKEN. I would be delighted to select a part of the foreign-aid funds from which the $5 million could be deleted.

Mr. BRIDGES. I think that could be done.

Mr. AIKEN. At the time when the concurrent resolution was submitted, I believe the White House was supporting the idea. However, I have heard nothing further from it lately, and I do not know what has happened.

Mr. BRIDGES. I thought I should bring it to the attention of the Senator. It is a worthy objective, and I think it is a very practical approach. Certainly, it would be wise to consider that approach once a year to see what would happen. We have certainly spent money on less worthy projects, and we have sometimes obtained rather small results.

Mr. AIKEN. The Senator from New Hampshire knows, of course, he will have an opportunity to review these reports, because these communications are being referred to the Committee on Armed Services, of which the Senator from New Hampshire is a high ranking member.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The following reports of committees were submitted:

CONTINUANCE OF STUDY OF U.S. FOREIGN POLICY

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, I report an original resolution authorizing a continuing study of U.S. foreign policy, and I submit a report (No. 1027) thereon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report will be received and printed; and, under the rule, the resolution will be referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

The resolution (S. Res. 250) was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized under sections 134(a) and 136 of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, as amended, and in accordance with its jurisdiction specified by rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate, to examine, investigate, and make a complete study of any and all matters pertaining to the conduct of United States foreign policy, with special reference to Latin America, and the problems of world disarmament.

SEC. 2. For the purposes of this resolution the committee, from February 1, 1960, to January 31, 1961, inclusive, is authorized (1) to make such expenditures; (2) to employ upon a temporary basis, technical, clerical, and other assistants and consultants; (3) to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions, recesses, and adjourned periods of the Senate; (4) to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such correspondence, books, papers, and documents; (5) to take such testimony; and (6) with the prior consent of the heads of the departments or agencies concerned, and the Committee on Rules and Administration, to utilize the reimbursable services, information, facilities and personnel of any of the departments or agencies of the Government, as it deems advisable.

SEC. 3. In the conduct of its studies the committee may use the experience, knowledge, and advice of private organizations, schools, institutions, and individuals in its discretion, and it is authorized to divide the work of the studies among such individuals, groups, and institutions as it may deem appropriate and may enter into contracts for this purpose.

SEC. 4. Expenses of the committee, under this resolution, which shall not exceed $185,000 for the period ending January 31, 1961, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

INTERIM REPORT ENTITLED "ORGANIZING FOR NATIONAL SECURITY" (S. REPT. NO. 1026)

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, from the Committee on Government Operations, pursuant to Senate Resolution 115, 86th Congress, I submit an interim report entitled "Organizing for National Security," which I ask may be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report will be received and printed, as requested by the Senator from Washington.

INVESTIGATION OF EFFICIENCY AND ECONOMY OF ALL BRANCHES OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. McCLELLAN, from the Committee on Government Operations, reported an original resolution (S. Res. 246) to investigate the efficiency and economy of operations of all branches of the Government, which, under the rule, was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration, as follows:

Resolved, That in holding hearings, reporting such hearings, and making investigations as authorized by section 134 of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 and in accordance with its jurisdiction under Rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate, the Committee on Government Operations, or any subcommittee thereof, is authorized from February 1, 1960, through January 31, 1961, to make investigations into the efficiency and economy of operations of all branches of the Government including the possible existence of fraud, misfeasance, malfeasance, collusion, mismanagement, incompetence, corrupt or unethical practices, waste, extravagance, conflicts of interest, and the improper expenditure of Government funds, in transactions, contracts, and activities of the Government or of Government officials and employees; and any and all such improper practices between Government personnel and corporations, individuals, companies, or persons affiliated therewith, doing business with the Government; and the compliance or noncompliance of such corporations, companies, or individuals or other entities with the rules, regulations, and laws governing the various Governmental agencies and its relationships with the public: Provided, That, in carrying out the duties herein set forth, the inquiries of this committee shall not be deemed limited to the records, functions, and operations of the particular branch of the Government under inquiry, and may extend to the records and activities of persons, corporations, or other entities dealing with or affecting that particular branch of the Government; (1) to make such expenditures as it deems advisable; (2) to employ upon a temporary basis such technical, clerical, and other assistants and consultants as it deems advisable: Provided further, That the minority is authorized to select one person for appointment and the person selected shall be appointed and his compensation shall be so fixed that his gross rate shall not be less by more than $1,200 than the highest gross rate paid to any other employee; and (3) with the prior consent of the head of the department or agency concerned, and of the Committee on Rules and Administration, to utilize the reimbursable services, information, facilities, and personnel of any of the departments or agencies of the Government.

SEC. 2. The expenses of the committee under this resolution, which shall not exceed $275,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate by vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

ADDITIONAL FUNDS FOR COMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS

Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Government Operations, reported an original resolution (S. Res. 248) providing additional funds for the Committee on Government Operations, which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration, as follows:

Resolved, That in holding hearings, reporting such hearings, and making investigations as authorized by section 134 of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, and in accordance with its jurisdiction under rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate, the Committee on Government Operations, or any subcommittee thereof, is authorized, from February 1, 1960 to January 31, 1961, inclusive, to make studies as to the efficiency and economy of operations of all branches of the Government with particular reference to—

(1) the effectiveness of the present organizational structures and operational methods of agencies and instrumentalities of the Federal Government at all levels in the formulation, coordination, and execution of an integrated national policy for the solution of the problems of survival with which the free world is confronted in the contest with world communism;

(2) the capacity of such structures and methods to utilize with maximum effectiveness the skills, talents, and resources of the Nation in the solution of those problems; and

(3) development of whatever legislative and other proposals or means may be required whereby such structures and methods can be reorganized or otherwise improved to be more effective in formulating, coordinating, and executing an integrated national policy, and to make more effective use of the sustained, creative thinking of our ablest citizens for the solution of the full range of problems facing the free world in the contest with world communism.

SEC. 2. For the purposes of this resolution, the committee, from February 1, 1960, to January 31, 1961, inclusive, is authorized—

(1) to make such expenditures as it deems advisable;

(2) to employ upon a temporary basis and fix the compensation of technical, clerical, and other assistants and consultants: Provided, That the minority of the committee is authorized at its discretion to select one such person for appointment, and the person so selected shall be appointed and shall receive compensation at an annual gross rate not less by more than $1,200 than the highest gross rate paid to any other employee; and

(3) with the prior consent of the head of the department or agency concerned, and the Committee on Rules and Administration, to utilize on a reimbursable basis the services, information, facilities, and personnel of any department or agency of the Government.

SEC. 3. Expenses of the committee under this resolution, which shall not exceed $125,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

REPORT ON DISPOSITION OF EXECUTIVE PAPERS

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina, from the Joint Select Committee on the Disposition of Papers in the Executive Departments, to which was referred to examination and recommendation a list of records transmitted to the Senate by the Administrator of General Services that appeared to have no permanent value or historical interest, submitted a report thereon, pursuant to law.

CONTINUANCE OF STUDY OF U.S. FOREIGN POLICY

Mr. FULBRIGHT, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported an original resolution (S. Res. 250) authorizing a continuing study of U.S. foreign policy, which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

(See the above resolution printed in full when reported by Mr. FULBRIGHT, which appears under the heading "Reports of Committees.")

COMMITTEE SERVICE

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, the Republican committee on committees has concluded its committee assignments. The recommendations were approved by the conference held this morning.

I therefore submit a resolution which embodies the recommendations, and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The resolution (S. Res. 251) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senator from Indiana, Mr. CAPEHART, is excused from further service on the Committee on Government Operations; the Senator from Delaware, Mr. WILLIAMS, is excused from further service on the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry; the Senator from New Hampshire, Mr. COTTON, is excused from further service on the Committee on Finance; the senior Senator from Kentucky, Mr. COOPER, is excused from further service on the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare; and the junior Senator from Kentucky, Mr. MORTON, is excused from further service on the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service and on the Committee on Rules and Administration.

Be it further resolved, That the Senator from Delaware, Mr. WILLIAMS, be assigned to the Committee on Foreign Relations; the Senator from New Hampshire, Mr. COTTON, be assigned to the Committee on the Judiciary; the senior Senator from Kentucky, Mr. COOPER, be assigned to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry; the junior Senator from Kentucky, Mr. MORTON, be assigned to the Committee on Finance; the Senator from New York, Mr. JAVITS, be assigned to the Committee on Government Operations; the Senator from Hawaii, Mr. FONG, be assigned to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service; and the Senator from North Dakota, Mr. BRUNSDALE, be assigned to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service and the Committee on Rules and Administration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 251) was considered and agreed to.

CONTINUATION OF COMMITTEE ON UNEMPLOYMENT PROBLEMS

Mr. McCARTHY submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 252), which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Unemployment Problems established and authorized pursuant to Senate Resolution 196, adopted September 22, 1959, is hereby continued through June 30, 1960.

SEC. 2. Expenses of the committee under this resolution for the period February 1, 1960, through June 30, 1960, which shall not exceed $24,682.61, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon voucher approved by the chairman of the committee.

AUTHORIZATION TO MICROFILM BOTH UNION AND CONFEDERATE MILITARY AND NAVAL RECORDS OF CIVIL WAR

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill authorizing the microfilming of the original official records of the Union and Confederate Armies and Navies and other records now in the National Archives and other places. This measure would enable many scholars across the country to have access to these priceless historical records, thus increasing the public knowledge of our great heritage.

A companion bill was introduced in the House of Representatives last year by Representative FRED SCHWENGEL, of Iowa, and is of importance to the Civil War Centennial Commission, and many libraries across the country, including the Texas State library. The State archivist of Texas, Mr. Dorman H. Winfrey, has called this matter to my attention, and I hope that this bill may be enacted to allow him to so render even greater services to the people of Texas, just as it would enable other librarians to render similar services to their States and thus to all the people of the United States.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill, together with a letter addressed to me by the State Archivist of Texas be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill and letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 2841) to authorize and direct the Administrator of General Services to publish on microfilm the original military and naval records of the Civil War, both Union and Confederate, introduced by Mr. YARBOROUGH, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Government Operations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, in connection with the centennial of the Civil War, the Administrator of General Services is hereby authorized and directed to microfilm for publication or to procure the microfilming for publication of the original official records of the Union and Confederate Armies, Navies, War and Navy Departments and such other official Confederate records as are not now included in the War Department collection of Confederate records in the National Archives: Provided, That there shall be excluded from the records microfilmed such series of records as the Archivist of the United States may deem to be of insufficient historical value to warrant the the cost of microfilm publication: Provided further, That when any of the records to be microfilmed are not now in the custody of the Administrator, the consent of the present holders thereof shall be obtained.

SEC. 2. The Administrator of General Services shall cause a printed descriptive catalog of the microfilm publication prepared in accordance with this Act to be issued from time to time to reflect the current stage of progress in the work of publication until such time as the whole project shall be completed.

SEC. 3. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the Administrator of General Services such sum, not exceeding $50,000 per year for ten fiscal years, as may be required to cover the costs of preparing the records for microfilm publication and making a negative and security copies thereof.

The letter presented by Mr. YARBOROUGH is as follows:

TEXAS STATE LIBRARY,
ARCHIVES DIVISION, CAMP HUBBARD,
Austin, Tex., January 4, 1960.

The Honorable RALPH W. YARBOROUGH,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR YARBOROUGH: Thank you so much for your letter of December 28, 1959, concerning the Civil War service records of Texans now in the National Archives.

In 1955 the National Archives microfilmed its carded index file of Texas Confederate soldiers and made it available on 41 rolls of microfilm as the National Archives Index to Compiled Service Records of Confederate Soldiers from Texas. We do have this in the State archives.

I feel certain that more recent legislation has been passed concerning the microfilming of Confederate and Union records, and that I just do not know about it. In the American Archivist (January 1959), there was the following item:

An assembly of interested organizations, called by the Civil War Centennial Commission a year ago, endorsed the idea of microfilming the important Civil War records in the National Archives and elsewhere. Representative FRED SCHWENGEL, chairman of the Commission's Legislative Committee, has introduced a bill in Congress that would authorize the appropriation of $50,000 per year for this purpose. "For the first time," commented the Commission's Executive Director, "it will be possible, if this bill is passed, to study, without coming to Washington, the day-to-day and hour-to-hour business transacted by war officials on both sides."

And in the American Archivist, July 1959, the following item appeared:

"Congressman FRED SCHWENGEL, of Iowa, stated that bills had been introduced in Congress calling for an appropriation of $500,000 to microfilm Union and Confederate records in the National Archives."

I would be interested in any information you may have about the above legislation. I hope the charge for microfilm will not be large. It took our State archives 4 years to secure the 41 rolls of the National Archives Index to Compiled Service Records of Confederate Service Records, and then the money to purchase the microfilm had to come through private sources. Any assistance you can render in this matter will be deeply appreciated by the customers of the Texas State archives and Texans throughout the State. I am sure you agree that the next few years will see much research done on the subject of the Civil War. I want to make everything possible on the subject available here.

Respectfully yours,

DORMAN H. WINFREY,
State Archivist.

NORTHEASTERN WATER AND RELATED LAND RESOURCES COMPACT

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, my colleague, the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DODD], the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. MUSKIE], the Senators from Massachusetts [Messrs. SALTONSTALL and KENNEDY], the Senators from New Hampshire [Messrs. BRIDGES and COTTON], the Senators from Rhode Island [Messrs. GREEN and PASTORE], and the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROUTY], I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill granting the consent and approval of Congress to the northeastern water and related land resources compact.

Mr. President, the compact proposes a unique experiment in Federal-State relations which may set a nationwide pattern for regional conservation and development of water and related land resources. For the first time in our history, the many Federal agencies concerned with these problems would be brought into a continuing cooperative relationship with the States.

The hurricanes and floods which have taken a disastrous toll of lives and property in New England in recent years have emphasized the need for an effective, coordinated protective program. Much progress has been made since the tragic flood disasters of 1955, but much more remains to be accomplished. The proposed compact offers a method of expediting this vital work, and other related programs, such as the development of water resources for recreational, domestic and industrial use, the improvement of harbors, and the prevention of erosion of the beaches on the Atlantic coast and Long Island Sound.

The compact already has been approved by the legislative bodies of four States; Connecticut, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and Rhode Island. By its terms, it will become effective when approved by the Congress. I trust that approval will be given promptly.

Mr. President, an excellent summary of the history of cooperative efforts to develop New England's water and related land resources, of problems encountered in Federal-State relations in this area, and of the need for the proposed compact was given in testimony by William S. Wise, director of the Connecticut Water Resources Commission and vice chairman of the Northeastern Resources Committee, before the Senate Select Committee on Water Resources at Boston, Mass., on December 8, 1959. I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Wise's statement, which was presented in behalf of the Governors of the New England States, may be printed in the RECORD following these remarks, together with the bill itself.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill and statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 2842) granting the consent and approval of Congress to the northeastern water and related land resources compact, introduced by Mr. BUSH (for himself, Mr. BRIDGES, Mr. COTTON, Mr. DODD, Mr. GREEN, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. MUSKIE, Mr. PASTORE, Mr. PROUTY, and Mr. SALTONSTALL, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the consent and approval of Congress is given to the Northeastern Water and Related Land Resources Compact, as hereinafter set out. Such compact reads as follows:

"NORTHEASTERN WATER AND RELATED LAND RESOURCES COMPACT "ARTICLE I

"Findings

"The northeastern part of the United States is by virtue of geographic location and other characteristics a great natural resource area which, with more intense use of natural resouces, increasingly requires coordinated planning as a basic ingredient of effective resource management and orderly growth of the region. The work of the New England-New York Inter-Agency Committee demonstrated that a continuation and furtherance of activities such as those undertaken by it would be of great value. To this end, it is the intent of this compact to establish and provide for the operation of a joint agency for the Northeast.

"ARTICLE II

"Purpose

"It is the purpose of this compact to provide, in the northeastern region, improved facilities and procedures for the coordination of the policies, programs, and activities of the United States, the several states, and private persons or entities, in the field of water and related land resources, and to study, investigate, and plan the development and use of the same and conservation of such water and related land resources; to provide means by which conflicts may be resolved; and to provide procedures for coordination of the interests of all public and private agencies, persons and entities in the field of water and related land resources; and to provide an organization for cooperation in such coordination on both the federal and state levels of government.

"ARTICLE III

"Creation of Commission

"There is hereby created the Northeastern Resources Commission, hereinafter called the Commission.

"ARTICLE IV

"Membership

"The Commission shall consist of one member from each party state to be appointed and to serve, in accordance with and subject to the laws of the state which he represents, and seven members representing departments or agencies of the United States having principal responsibilities for water and related land resources development to be appointed and to serve in such manner as may be provided by the laws of the United States.

"ARTICLE V

"Functions

"It shall be the responsibility of the Commission to recommend to the states and the United States, or any intergovernmental agency, changes in law or policy which would promote coordination, or resolution of problems, in the field of water and related land resources. The efforts of the Commission in coordination of work and resolution of conflicts may be directed towards all state and federal activities involved in water and related land resources development responsibilities and shall include coordination of the following:

"(1) Collection and interpretation of basic data.

"(2) Investigation and planning of water and related land resources projects.

"(3) Programming (including scheduling) of water and related land resources construction and development.

"(4) Encouraging of the referral of plans or proposals for resources projects to the Commission.

"The Commission shall use qualified public and private agencies to make investigations and conduct research in the field of water and related land resources, but if it is unable to secure the undertaking of such investigations or original research by a qualified public or private agency, it shall have the power to make its own investigations and conduct its own research. The Commission may make contracts with any public or private agencies or private persons or entities for the undertaking of such investigations, or original research within its purview.

"ARTICLE VI

"Voting

"No action of the Commission respecting the internal management thereof shall be binding unless taken at a meeting at which a majority of the members are present and vote in favor thereof: provided that any action not binding for such a reason may be ratified within thirty days by the concurrence in writing of a majority of the Commission membership. No action of the Commission respecting a matter other than its internal management shall be binding unless taken at a meeting at which a majority of the state members and a majority of the members representing the United States are present and a majority of said state members together with a majority of said members representing the United States vote in favor thereof: provided that any action not binding for such a reason may be ratified within thirty days by the concurrence in writing of a majority of the state members and the concurrence in writing of a majority of the members representing the United States.

"ARTICLE VII

"Finances

"A. The Commission shall submit to the Governor or designated officer of each party state a request for funds to cover estimated expenditures for such period as may be required by the laws of that jurisdiction for presentation to the legislature thereof. Any such request shall indicate the sum or sums which the Commission has requested or intends to request be appropriated by the United States for the use or support of the Commission during the period covered thereby.

"B. With due regard for such monies and other assistance as may be made available to it, the Commission shall be provided with such funds by each of the several states participating therein to provide the means of establishing and maintaining facilities, a staff of personnel, and such activities as may be necessary to fulfill the powers and duties imposed upon and entrusted to the Commission.

"With due allowance for monies otherwise available, each budget of the Commission shall be the responsibility of the party states, to be apportioned among them on a weighted formula based 50% on population and 50% on gross land area, such population and gross land area to be determined in accordance with the last official U.S. Census of Population, but provided that the total contributions of all of the states shall not be required to exceed $50,000 annually and provided further that regardless of the number of states party to the compact at any time the maximum annual contribution required of any state shall not exceed its share of the $50,000 as determined above. Any state may contribute such funds in excess of its share, as determined above, as it may desire.

"C. The Commission shall not pledge the credit of any jurisdiction. The Commission may meet any of its obligations in whole or in part with funds available to it under Article VIII (E) of this compact, provided that the Commission takes specific action setting aside such funds prior to the incurring of any obligation to be met in whole or in part in such manner.

"D. The members of the Commission shall be paid by the Commission their actual expenses incurred and incident to the performance of their duties, subject to the approval of the Commission.

"E. The Commission shall keep accurate accounts of all receipts and disbursements. The receipts and disbursements of the Commission shall be subject to the audit and accounting procedures established under its by-laws. However, all receipts and disbursements of funds handled by the Commission shall be audited by a qualified public accountant and the report of the audit shall be included in and become a part of the annual report of the Commission.

"F. The accounts of the Commission shall be open at any reasonable time for inspection by such agency, representative, or representatives of the jurisdictions which appropriate funds to the Commission.

"ARTICLE VIII

"Administration and management

"A. The Commission may sue and be sued, and shall have a seal.

"B. The Commission shall elect annually, from among its members, a chairman, vice chairman and treasurer. The Commission shall appoint an executive director who shall also act as secretary, and together with the treasurer, shall be bonded in such amounts as the Commission may require.

"C. The Commission shall appoint and remove or discharge such personnel as may be necessary for the performance of its functions irrespective of any civil service laws which might otherwise apply. The Commission shall establish and maintain, independently, by contract or agreement with the United States or an agency thereof, or in conjunction with any one or more of the party states, suitable retirement programs for its employees. Employees of the Commission shall be eligible for social security coverage in respect to old age and survivors insurance provided that the Commission takes such steps as may be necessary pursuant to federal law to participate in such program of insurance as a governmental agency or unit. The Commission may establish and maintain or participate in such additional programs of employee benefits as may be appropriate to afford employees of the Commission terms and conditions of employment similar to those enjoyed by employees of the party states generally.

"D. The Commission may borrow, accept or contract for the services of personnel from any state or the United States or any subdivision or agency thereof, from any intergovernmental agency, or from any institution, person, firm, or corporation.

"E. The Commission may accept for any of its purposes and functions under this compact any and all appropriations, donations, and grants of money, equipment, supplies, materials and services, conditional or otherwise, from any state or the United States or any subdivision or agency thereof, or intergovernmental agency, or any institution, person, firm or corporation, and may receive, utilize and dispose of the same.

"F. The Commission may establish and maintain such facilities as may be necessary for the transacting of its business. The Commission may accept, hold, and convey real and personal property and any interest therein.

"G. The Commission may adopt, amend, and rescind by-laws, rules, and regulations for the conduct of its business.

"H. The Commission shall make and transmit annually, to the legislature and Governor of each party state, and to the President and Congress of the United States, a report covering the activities of the Commission for the preceding year, and embodying such recommendations as may have been adopted by the Commission. The Commission may issue such additional reports as it may deem desirable.

"ARTICLE IX

"Other compacts and activities

"Nothing in this compact shall be construed to impair, or otherwise affect, the jurisdiction of any interstate agency in which any party state participates nor to abridge, impair, or otherwise affect the provisions of any compact to which any one or more of the party states may be a party, nor to supersede, diminish, or otherwise affect any obligation assumed under any such compact. Nor shall anything in this compact be construed to discourage additional interstate compacts among some or all of the party states for the management of natural resources, or the coordination of activities with respect to a specific natural resource or any aspect of natural resource management, or for the establishment of intergovernmental planning agencies in subareas of the region. Nothing in this compact shall be construed to limit the jurisdiction or activities of any participating government, agency, or officer thereof, or any private person or agency.

"ARTICLE X

"Enactment

"A. This compact shall become effective when entered into and enacted into law by any three of the states of Connecticut, Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, and Vermont, and when the United States has provided by law for the designation of its representation on the Commission. Thereafter it shall become effective with respect to any other aforementioned state upon its enacting this compact into law.

"B. Upon consent of the Congress of the United States of America, any other State in the northeastern area may become a party to this compact, by entering into and enacting this compact into law.

"ARTICLE XI

"Withdrawal

"This compact shall continue in force and remain binding upon each party state until renounced by it. Renunciation of this compact must be preceded by sending three years' notice in writing of intention to withdraw from the compact to the governor of each of the other states party hereto and to such officers or agencies of the United States as may be designated by federal law.

"ARTICLE XII

"Construction and severability

"The provisions of this compact shall be severable and if any phrase, clause, sentence or provision of this compact is declared to be unconstitutional or the applicability thereof, to any state, agency, person, or circumstance is held invalid, the constitutionality of the remainder of this compact and the applicability thereof to any other state, agency, person or circumstance shall not be affected thereby. It is the legislative intent that the provisions of this compact be reasonably and liberally construed.

"SEC. 2. The consent of Congress is given to any of the States of Connecticut, Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, and Vermont to become a party to the Northeastern Water and Related Land Resources Compact in accordance with its terms.

"SEC. 3. (a) The President is authorized to appoint seven members, representing departments or agencies of the United States having principal responsibilities for water and related land resources development, to the Commission created by the Northeastern Water and Related Land Resources Compact.

"(b) Each such representative shall receive compensation and travel expenses, including per diem in lieu of subsistence, in the manner provided for experts and consultants in sections 5 and 15 of the Administrative Expenses Act of 1946, except that (1) the time limitation with respect to the length of services authorized in such section 15 shall not apply, (2) the per diem rate of compensation for such representative shall be such amount, not in excess of $100, as is established by the President, and (3) the total compensation paid in any calendar year to such representative shall not exceed $15,000. A retired military officer of the United States or a retired civilian employee of the United States may be appointed to serve as such representative without prejudice to his retired status, and shall receive compensation as authorized in this subsection except that his retired pay or annuity under Federal law and compensation under this subsection shall not exceed $15,000 in any calendar year. If an employee of the United States is appointed to serve as such representative in addition to his regular duties as such employee, he shall serve without additional compensation.

"SEC. 4. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this Act is expressly reserved."

The statement presented by Mr. BUSH is as follows:

NEW ENGLAND GOVERNORS' CONFERENCE

A statement concerning the water resources of New England presented in behalf of the Governors of the New England States to the Senate Select Committee on Water Resources, U.S. Senate, by William S. Wise, director, Connecticut Water Resources Commission, Boston, Mass., December 8, 1959

The individual New England States and many of the State agencies will present more detailed information at this hearing covering varying phases of water resources conservation and development. Consequently, this presentation will cover only general statements and conclusions for the region.

The opening sentence of the findings of the Northeastern Water and Related Land Resources Compact states:

"The northeastern part of the United States is by virtue of the geographic location and other characteristics a great natural resource area which, with more intense use of natural resources, increasingly requires coordinated planning as a basic ingredient of effective resource management and orderly growth of the region."

The Governors of the New England States heartily concur in this statement and unanimously support any sound and equitable program which promotes the growth, prosperity, and welfare of this great region. What benefits this region also benefits the Nation.

This statement will present briefly a review of the water resources under three main headings:

1. Water resources of the area.
2. Accomplishments in water resource development.
3. Policy and program needs for the future.

WATER RESOURCES OF THE AREA

History supports the contention that New England comprises one of the great industrial and recreational regions of the country. One of the most important factors contributing to this fact is the nature and extent of its water resources—ample in quantity and generally suitable in quality. They are also unusually well distributed and reasonably accessible to the centers of demand. New England occupies an enviable position in this respect.

The water resources, in this 65,000 square mile area, are contained in thousands of lakes, ponds, and reservoirs with a total water surface area estimated at 3,500 square miles and in over 75,000 miles of rivers and streams with drainage areas ranging in size from over 10,000 square miles to only a fraction of a square mile. An undetermined, but obviously large, volume is hidden under the ground surface. New England is also fortunate in having a beautiful shoreline approximately 4,600 miles long. This constitutes a tremendously valuable recreational asset, a source for industrial supplies where saline water is useful, and also as an unlimited potential source of fresh water when salt water conversion becomes feasible and economical. Because of the large number of undeveloped potential fresh water supplies it does not seem likely that there will be a heavy demand for such water in the foreseeable future, except for special requirements.

ACCOMPLISHMENTS IN WATER RESOURCE DEVELOPMENT

The development of water resources in New England has reached its present stage largely through the efforts and initiative of private interests and by a people who traditionally have been doing things for themselves. Currently consideration is being given to providing storage in flood control reservoirs for future supplemental water supplies. This has great merit in those areas where the future conditions may become critical, provided the beneficiaries bear an equitable share of the costs for this service.

The people of the New England States have generally adjusted themselves to the principles of State sovereignty in those matters affecting their economy. In those problems of regional scope they have endeavored to find the solutions through interstate compacts and interstate agreements. This practice has proven to be very effective in the attack on broad scale complex problems and in uniting the people in a common interest for their common good.

In 1947 the States joined in a compact setting up the New England Interstate Water Pollution Control Commission for the purpose of controlling pollution in interstate rivers and waterways, a fundamental step in the conservation of the region's water resources. The Connecticut River Valley Flood Control Commission was created in 1955 by the States of Vermont, New Hampshire, Massachusetts and Connecticut to coordinate and program the construction of flood control works on the Connecticut River watershed. In 1957 the States of Connecticut and Massachusetts created the Thames River Valley Flood Control Commission to coordinate efforts in reducing the ravages of floods in that valley. Less formal associations have served this region well in the numerous interstate problems.

This region was the locale of the most outstanding experiment in Federal-State relations ever undertaken in this country. Through a Presidential directive in 1950 the New England-New York Interagency Committee was created to make a thorough study of the natural resources in this area. Representatives from each of the 7 States involved and from seven Federal agencies worked, struggled, and compromised for 4 years to complete a factual report contained in 43 volumes and at a cost of over $5 million. This was the most comprehensive study of its type ever undertaken in the field of water and related natural resources.

Following the discharge of this committee the New England Governors, in 1956 through a charter created the Northeastern Resources Committee with a similar membership of States (except New York) and Federal agencies to implement this report and its recommendations. In 1958 after 2 years of organizational endeavors the Governors again indicated their interest in the continuation of the work of this committee in a memorandum of understanding between the States involved. The results of these efforts and the growing concern over resource problems have aroused public opinion strongly supporting a permanent and more effective status for this committee. Consequently legislation in the form of a compact, between the New England States and the Federal Government, was introduced into the States' general assemblies in 1959. Four States, Connecticut, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and Rhode Island, already have approved this document and the Northeastern Water and Related Land Resources Compact will be presented for action in the next session of Congress. If enacted this could become the most useful agency for coordinating the conservation and development of natural resources in this region.

With few exceptions the public water supplies of this region are obtained from unpolluted sources and therefore the States have always diligently followed a strong policy seeking to protect the quality of the waters for future expansion and development. New England has pioneered in stream pollution control and some of the early treatment works were constructed here. The different States, individually and collectively, are engaged in other programs involving certain phases of water resource management, such as flood control, shore and beach erosion control, stream encroachment control, dredging and construction in tidal and navigable waters, supervision of dams and drainage. Cooperative programs have long been carried out with Federal agencies—Army Engineers and Geological Survey—on flood control, beach erosion control, stream gaging, ground water investigations, quality of water studies, and geological mapping.

In the realm of law of water rights and water use the New England States have generally followed the common law of riparian rights. The general adoption of this principle by the States in the eastern and midwestern portions of the country has caused this to be referred to frequently as the eastern law in contrast to the western law followed by those States in the western part of the country. The doctrine of riparian rights has adequately served the growth and prosperity of this region and while some of the States are examining their laws in this field to determine if they are outmoded, it is questionable, if changes are found to be necessary, that they will be based extensively on the western doctrine.

POLICY AND PROGRAM FOR THE FUTURE

The fields of water resource investigation and management are becoming overcrowded with activities of multifarious agencies—both governmental and private—which if uncontrolled might cause a confused condition approaching chaos. Initiative and competence should not be suppressed but proper channels should be established for directing the activities toward their maximum productivity.

A partial cause of this perplexing situation is the reluctance of Federal and State Governments in setting forth policies and indicating possible guidelines for action. Then, too, it has frequently been claimed that the only method of attack on this problem is from the top level of government down rather than from the lower levels of government and activity up. It is obvious that all levels of government and activity must participate but each in its own special sphere of influence and responsibility.

In line with this premise the most important and fundamental first step is the establishment of a sound national water policy. This policy should set forth six areas of principles and cooperative intent:

1. Recognize the differences in water problems, water rights, and water law existing between regions—especially the contrasting doctrines followed in the eastern and western sections of the country.

2. Encourage and facilitate participation by private interests or agencies to attract the wealth of competence and ability available in this sphere of action.

3. Encourage establishment of regional agencies and authorize binding agreements or compacts between the Federal Government and such agencies for positive, cooperative action.

4. Assure participation by State or local governments consistent with the impact upon the economy of the respective areas.

5. Delineate the functions and responsibilities of the various Federal agencies involved in water-resources problems to avoid duplication and confusion in administration.

6. Set forth procedures for coordinating and channeling the activities of all agencies involved.

Conflicts now exist between Federal and State Governments and with the increasing attention being given to water resource matters by both governments it is likely that the conflicts will become more acute. A clean cut national water policy could prove to be a great boon to sound resource development and should stimulate establishment of State water policies without risk of conflict with Federal piecemeal policies and procedures.

Congress has set a pattern for Federal assistance to the States and local communities in the construction of stream pollution control facilities through Public Law 660. This has greatly stimulated the construction of necessary treatment facilities to the extent that in some areas there are substantial backlogs of plans awaiting availability of Federal funds. The pollution control programs in New England would be greatly advanced if Congress provided increased funds for both construction and programing until the backlog of construction is reduced. It then should determine what policies would best maintain this program in a fluid and active state, recognizing that the State and local communities should bear their fair share of responsibility and support.

There is a great need for overall comprehensive planning to care for the many problems confronting the economy of local communities. These programs have been advanced by interest-free loans through the Federal Housing and Home Finance Agency. This service should be continued until the urgency has abated.

A well developed navigation system is as important to the Nation as it is to New England. The harbors of this region have not been as intensively developed for use by modern deepwater transportation craft as has been done in other areas. The needs for deeper harbors in New England must be recognized and positive steps taken to insure their construction in the near future.

In the fields of flood control, tidal flooding and hurricane protection, shore erosion, geologic mapping, surface and ground water studies the appropriate Federal agencies have provided invaluable assistance and support in carrying out these programs cooperatively with the respective States. From time to time the needs for temporarily accelerating these programs in certain areas becomes critical and provisions should be made for meeting these demands with the requirement of a fair share of support and participation by the States involved.

The water problems of New England are not as critical as they are in other sections of the Nation. Time is in our favor, but there is a common belief that this situation will not continue indefinitely. There is also a very real determination to prevent a lackadaisical approach to advance planning for meeting the future needs on both the State and Federal levels. Public sentiment strongly favors coordination and programing on a regional basis such as is contemplated under the Northeastern Water and Related Land Resources Compact. This would provide a sound and most effective procedure for a real Federal-State-local cooperative action. To demonstrate the productiveness of this plan and to assure an abundant future New England needs the helpful assistance of a sympathetic Congress, which could partially be supplied by favorable consideration of the previously suggested policies and procedures.

MODIFICATION OF LOWER MISSISSIPPI RIVER FLOOD CONTROL AND IMPROVEMENT PROJECT

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, the Mississippi River is without a doubt one of America's greatest assets and one of the principal sources of its wealth and well-being. The long, wide, deep river drains 42 percent of the entire United States into the Gulf of Mexico. On its way to the sea it picks up much sediment and meanders at will if it is not controlled by bank protection works.

During the course of its meanderings over a long period of time, the Mississippi River has changed its course on numerous occasions. Recently the Federal Government has found it necessary to take steps to prevent the river from changing its course in any particularly critical area where the change would have been so drastic that it would have affected the economy of the entire southern part of the country.

On several occasions the Mississippi River, in its process of building and cutting, has seen fit to build a mudbank in front of some of the harbors along the river. It has done this at New Madrid, Mo., Helena, Ark., and Lake Providence, La. As a result of this action of the river, the harbors at these three places have been cut off from access to the river. As the result of this action, the Federal Government, through the Corps of Engineers, cannot legally maintain the 9-foot channel in the Mississippi River that it guarantees for navigation on a year-round basis.

On behalf of myself, the Senators ELLENDER, FULBRIGHT, HENNINGS, and SYMINGTON, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill which will make it legal for the Corps of Engineers to maintain navigating depths in these chutes that have resulted from the action of the Mississippi River. This bill will make it possible for the engineers to construct and maintain low-water acce: navigation channels from the existing channel of the Mississippi River to established harbor areas along the river between Cairo, Ill., and Baton Rouge, La. This bill will limit this work in any particular locality for any single year to $150,000.

It is my feeling that, had we had corrective works years ago, we would never have permitted these harbors to be blocked off. It is only proper that we should now restore the harbors and make this important artery of our commerce available to those localities that have been cut off as the result of this unusual action of the river. The bill I am introducing will accomplish this purpose and will do so at a cost that is very negligible when the amount of good that it will accomplish is considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 2843) further modifying the lower Mississippi River flood control and improvement project, originally adopted May 15, 1928, introduced by Mr. LONG of Louisiana (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Works.

STABILIZATION OF PRICE SUPPORTS FOR TOBACCO

Mr. JORDAN. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER], the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON], the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. MORTON], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER], the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND], and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON], I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill designed to stabilize the price supports for tobacco.

This measure, Mr. President, would accomplish the same objectives as the Jordan-Cooper bill which was passed by the Congress last year and was vetoed by the President.

The new bill differs very little in its approach from the original Jordan-Cooper bill. It would allow prices of tobacco to fluctuate in direct relation to the prices farmers pay for the things necessary to the production of tobacco, including wages, taxes, interest, and the other costs involved in production. Under the bill, the 1960 price supports would be identical with those for the 1959 crop. Beginning with the 1961 crop, tobacco price supports would be computed on the basis of the average index of prices paid by farmers for the 3 calendar years immediately preceding each crop year. In this way, tobacco prices would move up or down in relation to the average cost of production for the 3 preceding calendar years.

I should like to emphasize that this measure represents another effort on the part of growers, warehousemen, dealers, and exporters of tobacco to stabilize prices in a manner that will help tobacco produced in the United States to regain its position in world markets.

For several years we have been losing at a dangerously rapid rate foreign markets for our tobacco. If action were not taken, we would lose still more, and farmers would be forced to take another acreage reduction, which would spell disaster for thousands of farm families. If this measure is enacted into law, it will bring hope of an increase in acreage allotments, because of the new foreign sales it will promote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 2845) to stabilize the price support of tobacco, introduced by Mr. JORDAN (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, I am glad to join the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. JORDAN], as I did last year, in introducing this bill to stabilize the support levels for tobacco. I enjoyed working last year with the distinguished Senator from North Carolina, and I look forward to working with him again this year in the interest of the enactment of this legislation. He is an able advocate of the interests of tobacco farmers, and has great knowledge of our tobacco program.

This bill is very similar in its practical effect to Senate bill 1901, which Senator JORDAN and I sponsored last year and which was passed by the Senate and by the House of Representatives.

This bill has the complete support of all the tobacco-grower organizations and the tobacco-State farm groups, and in fact of the entire tobacco industry.

I am particularly glad that the bill has the support of the Kentucky Farm Bureau Federation, the Burley Tobacco Growers' Cooperative Association, the Burley Auction Warehousemen's Association, the Western Dark-Fired Tobacco Growers' Association, and the Stemming District Tobacco Association, all of Kentucky.

In addition, this bill has the full support of the American Farm Bureau Federation, which opposed Senate bill 1901. And in view of the conferences which have been held with responsible officials of the Department of Agriculture in coordinating the presentation of this proposal, I trust that this bill will have the approval of the Department of Agriculture.

The purpose of the bill, which the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. JORDAN] and I are joining in introducing today, is to stabilize the price-support levels for tobacco, basing them on the 1959 support levels, which were the best in history. This would assure continuation of the present fair level of price support, which has resulted in good prices for tobacco growers, with adjustments reflecting any future changes in farmers' costs.

As an example of the improvement in farmers' prices under the tobacco program, I give the average price per pound of burley tobacco in recent years:

	Cents
Prewar, 1934–38	22.2
1941–45	40.0
1946–50	45.7
1951–55	52.5
1956–59	62.6

In addition to protecting farmers' prices—and this is of great importance—the bill will encourage the expansion of markets for tobacco in this country and abroad. Stabilizing the price-support levels for tobacco will permit manufacturers of tobacco products in this country and other countries to make their plans for a period of years, and will stimulate larger purchases.

I am sure this proposal will have the support of all Members of Congress from the tobacco-producing areas. I can see no reason why the bill should be opposed by any group, and I do not anticipate any objection. A preliminary hearing on the proposal was held by the House Committee on Agriculture on Thursday, January 14.

I trust that the Department of Agriculture will promptly approve this bill. I hope the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry will quickly report the bill; and, Mr. President, as a new member of that committee, I will urge, together with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. JORDAN], that the bill be passed.

I believe this measure certainly should be passed by the Congress without delay, and I see no reason why it should not be signed into law.

IMPORTATION OF ADULT HONEY BEES

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, by request, I introduce for appropriate reference, a bill to amend the act relating to the importation of adult honey bees. I ask unanimous consent that a letter from the Acting Secretary of Agriculture requesting the proposed legislation be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 2847) to amend the act relating to the importation of adult honey bees, introduced by Mr. ELLENDER, by request, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The letter presented by Mr. ELLENDER is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, D.C., January 6, 1960.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE,
U.S. Senate.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Transmitted herewith for the consideration of the Congress is a proposed bill to amend the act relating to the importation of adult honey bees.

The proposed legislation would amend the Honey Bee Act (42 Stat. 833; 7 U.S.C. 281) to prohibit or regulate the importation into the United States of adult honey bees of all species and subspecies. The present law is now specifically limited in its application to only one species of honey bees.

Apis mellifera, the present species' name for the honey bee designated as Apis mellifica in the act, is only one of four species of honey bees, the others being A. indica, A. florea, and A. dorsata. These latter three species may now be imported without restriction since the present act is specifically limited in its application to A. mellifera. Recently an infestation of Acarapis woodi, a mite that causes a serious disease of A. mellifera, was discovered at the Beltsville Bee Culture Laboratory of the Department of Agriculture in specimens of A. Indica imported from India. This illustrates the potential danger in importing species of Apis other than A. mellifera.

Acarine disease, caused by the mite Acarapis woodi Rennie, is one of the most serious diseases affecting the honey bee. This disease is considered more serious than any other disease of bees, adult or brood, by apiculturists in the countries where it exists. In areas abroad it has been so destructive that it has virtually wiped out the apiculture industry in heavily infested localities.

The acarine mite is known to be present in 22 countries which represent most of Europe plus South Africa, India, and two countries in South America—Argentina and Uruguay. It is possible the disease may also occur in other countries where its presence has not been noted. The probability of this is suggested by the recent receipt of a sample of abnormal bees by the bee culture laboratory at Beltsville from Punjab, India. The sample was Apis indica and was found infested with Acarapis woodi. This was the first record of the mite being present in India and first for the indica species.

At the present time, to our knowledge, we do not have the disease in the United States. We have had quarantines against importation of bees since 1922, imposed solely to exclude this disease. Should the disease be introduced into the United States, it could have a devastating effect not only upon beekeeping but upon agriculture in general through the more than 50 crops that now rely heavily on the honeybee for pollination. There are approximately 450,000 beekeepers in the United States operating a total number of colonies in excess of 5 million. The value of the honeybee in pollination is often quoted as at least 10 times that of the honey and beeswax crop of $50 million annually.

Amendment of the act as recommended would not involve the expenditure of any additional funds for its enforcement, since its effect would be to prohibit the importation of additional species of adult honeybees, except that the Department could bring in such bees under adequate safeguards if necessary for experimental purposes.

A similar letter is being sent to the Speaker of the House.

The Bureau of the Budget advises that there is no objection to the submission of this proposed legislation.

Sincerely yours,

TRUE D. MORSE,
Acting Secretary.

FEDERAL ELECTIONS ACT OF 1959—AMENDMENTS

Mr. HENNINGS submitted amendments, intended to be proposed by him, to the bill (S. 2436) to revise the Federal election laws, to prevent corrupt practices in Federal elections, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

EXPANSION OF SPECIAL SCHOOL MILK PROGRAM — ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR OF BILL

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the name of my distinguished colleague, the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE], may be added as a cosponsor of the bill (S. 2797) to increase and extend the special school milk program, introduced by me on January 13, 1960.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MONUMENT TO MEXICAN INDEPENDENCE—ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR OF BILL

Under authority of the order of the Senate of January 14, 1960, the name of Mr. YARBOROUGH was added as an additional cosponsor of the bill (S. 2827) to provide for the presentation by the United States to the people of Mexico of a monument commemorating the 150th anniversary of the independence of Mexico, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. KUCHEL (for himself and Senators MORSE, CHAVEZ, ENGLE, GRUENING, GOLDWATER, MANSFIELD, and DIRKSEN), on January 14, 1960.

ISSUANCE OF GOLD MEDAL IN RECOGNITION OF SERVICES OF DR. THOMAS A. DOOLEY—ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS OF JOINT RESOLUTION—EDITORIAL

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, on January 13, I introduced Senate Joint Resolution 148, which would authorize that a gold medal be struck for Dr. Thomas Dooley for his extraordinary services to mankind, both in the U.S. Navy and subsequently. I am glad to report this resolution is now sponsored by some 35 Senators.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the names of the Senators be printed at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the Senators' names were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate Joint Resolution 148 (medal for Mr. Dooley) sponsored by Mr. BUSH and Senators HENNINGS, JAVITS, SYMINGTON, MANSFIELD, BIBLE, BEALL, PROUTY, FONG, SCOTT, CASE of South Dakota, HUMPHREY, ROBERTSON, HRUSKA, PROXMIRE, MURRAY, DODD, SPARKMAN, SCHOEPPEL, WILLIAMS of New Jersey, GRUENING, JACKSON, MCGEE, ALLOTT, BYRD of Virginia, KUCHEL, THURMOND, YOUNG of North Dakota, MOSS, NEUBERGER, CURTIS, BENNETT, COOPER, CASE of New Jersey, and SALTONSTALL.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent that an editorial which was published January 16, in the Hartford Courant, entitled "A Medal for Dr. Dooley," be printed at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A MEDAL FOR DR. DOOLEY

There should be unanimity in Congress in supporting the resolution of Senator PRESCOTT BUSH calling for a medal honoring Dr. Thomas A. Dooley. Few contemporaries deserve it more than this young physician. Originally assigned to Laos and the surrounding area by the U.S. Navy, Dr. Dooley became so impressed by the need of these poor, gentle, and grateful people that after his discharge he raised money and went back with severeal colleagues as volunteer medical workers.

What he and his companions have done to help those unfortunate people, and the good will for the United States it has engendered, will never be fully appraised. There is an epic quality to it, enhanced immeasurably by the news that Dr. Dooley himself has been suffering from a cancer and that his own useful days may be numbered.

This country is dotted from end to end with metallic men on horseback who, to be sure, served what appeared to be useful ends. But the ends of society can be said to be improving when recognition is given to men like Dr. Dooley. Hartford has a statue to the discoverer of anesthesia, but this is a rarity. A medal to Dr. Dooley, as Senator BUSH suggests, would be America honoring one of her best-loved and most useful citizens.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I observe, for the benefit of the Senate, that sponsorship of this joint resolution remains open until the close of business tomorrow.

NOTICE OF PUBLIC HEARINGS ON SENATE RESOLUTION 94 BY COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a press release issued by the Committee on Foreign Relations announcing the scheduling of public hearings on Senate Resolution 94 on January 27, 1960.

There being no objection, the press release was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Committee on Foreign Relations will hold public hearings on Senate Resolution 94 on January 27, 1960, at 10 a.m., in room 4221, New Senate Office Building, Senator J. W. FULBRIGHT, chairman, announced today. This resolution, introduced by Senator HUMPHREY on March 24, 1959, would serve to repeal the so-called Connally amendment to the 1946 resolution which authorized the President to deposit with the United Nations a declaration accepting on behalf of the United States the compulsory jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice under certain conditions. The Connally amendment has the effect of reserving to the United States the right to determine unilaterally whether the subject matter of a dispute was essentially within its own domestic jurisdiction. Senate Resolution 94, which is a resolution of advice and consent, will require a two-thirds Senate vote for approval.

On January 27, the committee expects to hear administration witnesses, as well as witnesses who have asked to testify.

In connection with the forthcoming hearings, Senator FULBRIGHT released the attached reports on Senate Resolution 94 which the committee has received from the Departments of State and Justice:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE REPORT ON SENATE RESOLUTION 94

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, April 30, 1959.

The Honorable J. W. FULBRIGHT,
Chairman, Committee on Foreign Relations, U.S. Senate

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Thank you for your letter of March 25, enclosing a copy of Senate Resolution 94, relating to the recognition of the jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice in certain legal disputes hereafter arising, and requesting the views of the Department of State.

The Department notes that the resolution in question would amend Senate Resolution 196 of the 79th Congress, 2d session, by omitting the automatic reservation under which the United States reserved the right to determine unilaterally whether the subject matter of a dispute was essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of the United States. The Department of State favors omission of this automatic reservation from the U.S. declaration accepting compulsory jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice. The following considerations are believed to be relevant.

The reservation of a unilateral right to determine whether a particular matter lies essentially within domestic jurisdiction is regarded by some as inconsistent with the provision in the statute of the International Court of Justice (art. 36, par. 6) whereby the Court is to decide a dispute whether it has jurisdiction in a particular case. Under that view, such a reservation could be regarded as rendering the U.S. declaration illusory and as evidencing a distrust of the Court, contrary to our policy of support for referral to the Court of international legal disputes which cannot be settled otherwise.

This policy is in aid of the broad U.S. objective of fostering development of the rule of law in world affairs. With an automatic reservation in our own declaration accepting compulsory jurisdiction, the United States is hindered in urging upon all states the judicial settlement of international legal disputes and greater use of the World Court. The U.S. automatic reservation has served as a model for reservations in a number of other declarations accepting compulsory jurisdiction. It would be desirable for the United States to be in a strong position for advocating the elimination of automatic reservations.

Under the statute of the International Court of Justice (art. 36, par. 2), declarations accepting the Court's jurisdiction are made on a reciprocal basis. Thus any state against which the United States might bring suit is enabled today to invoke against us reciprocally the automatic reservation, and could determine unilaterally that the subject matter of our suit was essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of the defendant state. This is precisely what happened in the case of certain Norwegian loans (France v. Norway), decided by the International Court of Justice in 1958. There the defendant Norway successfully invoked the automatic reservation of France, and the French application was dismissed for lack of jurisdiction.

Elimination of the U.S. automatic reservation would not result in conferring jurisdiction on the World Court with respect to disputes over matters essentially within domestic jurisdiction. Disputes of this character would still be subject to exclusion from the Court's jurisdiction under the standard reservation on domestic jurisdiction. The Court would decide in particular cases whether this reservation was applicable.

As a practical matter, retention of the automatic reservation would not afford a defense having significant value. It was the understanding of the Senate when the automatic proviso was adopted that this reservation would never be improperly invoked and that the United States would be bound in good faith to accept the Court's jurisdiction in every case involving matters not essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of the United States. Thus, the United States as a matter of policy would expect to invoke the reservation only in those cases in which the Court itself would probably uphold a plea of domestic jurisdiction if interposed by the United States on the basis of the domestic jurisdiction reservation without the automatic proviso.

The Department of State notes that Senate Resolution 94 would retain in the resolving clause of Senate Resolution 196, 79th Congress, the words "hereafter arising" as a limitation on disputes to be submitted to the International Court of Justice. In their original context these words referred to the date of Senate Resolution 196, namely, August 2, 1946. In order to avoid any possible doubt as to the import of Senate Resolution 94, it would seem desirable to replace the words "hereafter arising" with an expression such as "arising after August 2, 1946" if it is intended to carry forward the limitation contained in Senate Resolution 196.

With warmest personal regards,

Most sincerely,

WILLIAM B. MACOMBER, Jr.,
Assistant Secretary.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE REPORT ON SENATE RESOLUTION 94

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
OFFICE OF THE DEPUTY
ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D.C., June 8, 1959.

Hon. J. W. FULBRIGHT,
Chairman, Committee on Foreign Relations, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR FULBRIGHT: This is in response to your request for the views of the Department of Justice concerning Senate Resolution 94 relating to the "recognition of the jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice in certain legal disputes hereafter arising."

The purpose of Senate Resolution 94 is to amend Senate Resolution 196 of the 79th Congress, 2d session, agreed to August 2, 1946, by which the Senate consented to the U.S. acceptance of the jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice with respect to international legal disputes upon the express terms provided therein. One of these terms reserved from the Court's jurisdiction "disputes with regard to matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of the United States as determined by the United States." This amendment would delete the words "as determined by the United States" from this reservation.

The legal effect of the proposed amendment would be to affirm unequivocally that the Court is the judge of its own jurisdiction as provided in article 36(6) of the statute of the Court to which the United States is a party. The proposed amendment would not otherwise change or alter any of the U.S. reservations including the reservation of disputes with regard to matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of the United States.

This Department recommends the adoption of this amendatory resolution by the U.S. Senate.

The proposed amendment would tend better to effectuate our settled national policy to encourage and develop the rule of law in the affairs of nations. The existing reservation of a unilateral right to determine what disputes are domestic has had the opposite tendency. First, it has served as an example for other nations to adopt similar limitations on the Court's jurisdiction. Second, it permits other nations on the basis of reciprocity to exercise the same right after a dispute has arisen. The inevitable effect, contrary to our objectives, is to frustrate the purpose of the advance acceptance by nations of the Court's jurisdiction and to weaken the Court as the principal organ of the United Nations for the judicial settlement of international legal disputes.

The proposed amendment would be fully consistent with article 36(6) of the statute of the International Court of Justice which provides "in the event of a dispute as to whether the Court has jurisdiction, the matter shall be settled by the decision of the Court."

The amendment would be consistent with the comparable reservation with respect to domestic matters in article 2(7) of the Charter of the United Nations.

Experience over a period of 13 years has demonstrated that the Court has not sought in any way to enlarge its limited jurisdiction. On the contrary, the Court in its judgments has meticulously applied relevant principles of international law on a case-by-case basis after affording to the parties before its full procedural safeguards.

For the foregoing reasons, it is the Department's conclusion that the national interest would be best served by the adoption of Senate Resolution 94.

The Bureau of the Budget has advised that there is no objection to the submission of this report.

Very truly yours,

LAWRENCE E. WALSH,
Deputy Attorney General.

ADDRESSES, EDITORIALS, ARTICLES, ETC., PRINTED IN THE RECORD

On request, and by unanimous consent, addresses, editorials, articles, etc., were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. PROXMIRE:

Address by Senator KENNEDY delivered at National Press Club, Washington, D.C., on January 14, 1960.

By Mr. JAVITS:

Opinion poll taken from small businessmen throughout the country and in New York State, submitted to him by the National Small Business Men's Association.

NEEDED: IMMEDIATE ACTION TO PROVIDE SUPPLEMENTAL FUNDS FOR THE SPECIAL MILK PROGRAM

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, last week I introduced Senate bill 2797, to provide supplemental funds for the current year for the special school milk program, as well as to extend and expand the program for the years ahead.

During the period in which this program has been in effect, it has been extremely useful in terms of providing an outlet for surplus milk, as well as improving the health of our school children.

To carry out the milk distribution program, school officials and community leaders have made a constructive effort to provide services and facilities, and have done an outstanding job.

As I stated upon the introduction of my bill, additional funds are needed immediately, if the program is not to suffer curtailment. As a matter of fact, the U.S. Department of Agriculture has already sent out directives that Federal participation is to be cut back on March 1, if the necessary money is not provided.

Fortunately, the Agriculture Committees in both the House and the Senate have recognized the need for expeditious action to avert curtailment of this program. As I understand, hearings to consider supplemental appropriations have been scheduled in the House committee for Wednesday, and in the Senate committe for Thursday of this week.

Today, I received a number of communications from school officials in Wisconsin, who point out the adverse impact which lack of funds would have on the milk program. These letters reflect the need for expeditious action; and I request unanimous consent to have a number of these printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS OF OCONTO, WIS.,
January 15, 1960.

The Honorable ALEXANDER WILEY,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

SIR: Early in November of 1958 the Secretary of Agriculture issued an amendment to his regulations governing the operation of the special milk program in which the rates of reimbursement are to be reduced by one-half cent per one-half pint of milk beginning March 1, 1960. This reduction would mean that schools serving type A school lunches, of which our school is one, the reimbursement rate would be dropped to 3½ cents per half pint of milk.

To the casual observer this may seem like a very insignificant amount and hardly worthy of consideration. This is not the case, however, as most school lunch programs are operated on a nonprofit basis to enable all students who so desire to take part in the program and receive a well balanced meal without a prohibitive cost to their parents.

In a low income area such as we have in our school district, this lack of revenue would have a profound effect upon our lunch program. It is very possible that a higher student assessment would be necessary, and this might discourage the very student who stands to gain the most from a program of this type.

As I understand it, the only way the Secretary's action can be rescinded would be through legislation on the part of the Congress to appropriate additional funds to make possible the continuation of existing rates and to issue a mandate to the Secretary of Agriculture requiring that the amendment to the regulations be withdrawn or adjusted.

We are all looking for ways to hold down the rising costs of taxes, and perhaps our community is selfish in its motives for perpetuating the school milk program as it now exists, but we are sure that this type of aid is providing positive help to many millions of school children who might be without nourishing food each day were it not for the school lunch program. Few Federal programs benefit so many.

We hope that you see fit to support any legislation which would make it possible to continue the milk support program at its present level.

Thank you for your kind consideration.

Very truly yours,

GERALD A. EYLER,
Superintendent.

JOINT SCHOOL DISTRICT NO. 1,
Glidden, Wis., January, 15, 1960.

Senator ALEXANDER WILEY,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR WILEY: I have received a communication from the Wisconsin School Food Service Association indicating that the Secretary of Agriculture has issued an amendment to his regulation governing the operation of the special milk program to the effect that the rates of the reimbursement are to be reduced by one-half cent per one-half pint of milk.

The purpose of this letter is to urge you to vote for legislation that would appropriate additional funds and also legislation requiring the amendment to the special lunch program to be rescinded. Any action you may take in this regard will be appreciated.

Sincerely yours,

E. B. CORRIGAN,
Supervising Principal.

WILTON PUBLIC SCHOOLS,
Wilton, Wis., January 15, 1960.

The Honorable ALEXANDER WILEY,
U.S. Senator from Wisconsin,
U.S. Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR WILEY: This is a protestation of the action taken by the Secretary of Agriculture reducing the Government reinbursement rate for milk provided schools in the special milk program.

This amendment to his regulation governing the operation of the special milk program will undoubtedly terminate the program, at least as far as providing free milk to the students is concerned in our school.

A reduction of Government reimbursement to 3½ cents per one-half pint will add an additional ½ cent to the 1 cent per one-half pint already expended by district funds for this program. This adds up to a 1½ cents per one-half pint cut which the school district must pay to have students enjoy the special milk program here at Wilton.

As the administrator of the Wilton Public Schools I wish to voice my objections to this Department of Agriculture action and I urge you, as one of our Congressmen, to use your influence to secure legislation in this present session to prevent the forthcoming reduction from becoming a reality.

Respectfully,

ALLEN E. SCHRAUFNAGEL,
Supervising Principal.

GALE-ETTRICK SCHOOL DISTRICT,
Galesville, Wis., January 15, 1960.

Senator ALEXANDER WILEY,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR WILEY: It is urgent that you exert all effort available to support a renewal of sufficient funds for the special milk program. It is imperative, since our budget has been established for the ensuing year, that the full value is received for all school milk.

Very sincerely yours,

VERMONT JOHNSON,
District Superintendent.

ONALASKA PUBLIC SCHOOLS,
Onalaska, Wis., January 15, 1960.

Hon. ALEXANDER WILEY,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. WILEY: I am disturbed by a recent directive from the Secretary of Agriculture ordering a cut in subsidy of one-half cent per half pint of milk used in the schools' special milk programs. This is a cut in this subsidy of 12½ percent and many school districts, including our own, are subsidizing lunch programs as much as they can. Our plans are made for this school year so that a cut going into effect March 1, 1960, fills us with consternation.

* * * * *

I appeal to you to use your resources to get this directive changed or to support legislation designed to maintain the present rate of Federal support.

Respectfully yours,

ROBERT G. PETERSON,
Superintendent.

U.S. COMMUNIST PARTY CONVENTION IN NEW YORK LAST DECEMBER

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, yesterday, January 17, Mr. J. Edgar Hoover, Director of the FBI, issued a statement alerting America to the results of the U.S. Communist Party convention in New York last December.

In my opinion, Mr. Hoover's significant statement is "must" reading for every Senator.

Noting that the 200 Communist delegates to the convention adjourned in a state of jubilance, Mr. Hoover said:

And well they might feel in high spirits, because Communist Party, U.S.A., emerged from this convention more powerful, more unified, and even more of a menace to our Republic.

Mr. Hoover further stated:

Without question, the most signal achievement was the welding of the Communist Party, U.S.A., into a solidly unified, aggressive force behind the militant, devious, and ruthless leadership of Gus Hall, exconvict and avowed archenemy of the American way of life.

Mr. Hoover then asked:

Why is the party so optimistic for the future? Why were Gus Hall and other Communists almost gleeful in speaking of Communist possibilities in the days ahead?

"The answer," Mr. Hoover declared, "comes from the convention proceedings, an answer which, like a thread, runs through all the remarks, actions, and hopes of the leadership."

The answer, Mr. Hoover stated very emphatically, is:

That the recent visit of Premier Khrushchev to the United States has done much to create an atmosphere favorable to communism among Americans.

Mr. President, this is exactly what I warned against last August before Mr. Khrushchev came to this country. Last summer I said I was opposed to the Khrushchev visit. I said I was very doubtful that any good would issue from it.

More than that, I said I feared it would have a softening effect on a certain element of our population and cause a lowering of our guard. Now, just a few months later, we find Mr. Hoover substantiating my fears.

Mr. Hoover reported:

In one convention discussion, for example, it was stated that as a result of the Khrushchev visit the American people have open minds toward socialism. Hence, the party must learn how to get socialism across to the people and break down misconceptions about the Soviet Union.

Mr. Hoover asserted:

To party leaders, Khrushchev's presence in this country has eased the way for party activities.

Mr. President, what is happening is exactly what I warned against last summer. I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Hoover's statements be printed at this point in the RECORD, so that it will receive the attention and widespread distribution it deserves.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY J. EDGAR HOOVER, DIRECTOR, FEDERAL BUREAU OF INVESTIGATION, CONCERNING THE 17TH NATIONAL CONVENTION, COMMUNIST PARTY U.S.A., DECEMBER 10–13, 1959

Profaning the very meaning and spirit of the "Star-Spangled Banner" by opening its sinister conclave with our national anthem, the Communist Party, U.S.A., convened its 17th national convention on December 10, 1959, in a hotel in New York City's Harlem section. Four days later, the same 200 delegates, representing other Communists throughout our Nation, adjourned in a state of jubilance.

And well they might feel in high spirits—because Communist Party, U.S.A., emerged from this convention more powerful, more unified, and even more of a menace to our Republic.

Without question, the most signal achievement was the welding of the Communist Party, U.S.A., into a solidly unified, aggressive force behind the militant, devious, and ruthless leadership of Gus Hall, exconvict and avowed archenemy of the American way of life.

Hall was elected general secretary of the party at the convention, and there is virtual unanimous agreement among party powers and rank and file that he is the No. 1 man in the party. As such, he now spearheads as powerful a group of dissidents and fanatic democracy haters as America has seldom seen within its shores during peacetime.

The Communist conspiracy in America today is led by a man who has openly boasted that he was willing to take up arms and fight to overthrow our form of government. Hall was convicted in Minneapolis, Minn., in 1934 in connection with a riot there when he was a member of the Young Communist League. During his trial he testified as follows:

"Question. But you would prefer the Russian—you would prefer to be in Russia?

"Answer. I prefer American with a Soviet government.

"Question. And you are willing to fight and overthrow this Government?

"Answer. Absolutely.

"Question. And you are willing to take up arms and overthrow the constituted authorities?

"Answer. When the time comes, 'Yes.'"

As a hot-blooded young Communist in the late 1930's, Hall was arrested in Ohio and charged with the possession and use of explosives. He subsequently pleaded guilty to a lesser charge of malicious destruction of property and was fined $500.

The election of the fiery Hall to lead a strongly knit Communist Party which has and always will have as its chief objective the communizing of America should certainly shake even the most apathetic American from his lethargy, especially when viewed in the light of this hardened Communist's own statements. During radio and television interviews at the convention, Hall gladly stated that the American public "definitely" has underestimated the size and influence of the Communist Party, U.S.A. He added that the Communists in this country should make even greater strides toward increasing its already growing number of members. He boasted that the party "is growing in industry and youth" due mainly to the change in political climate.

Assuredly, there is a significant lesson for every American in this display of machinations, propaganda, and opportunism which is communism itself at work within our borders. The 17th national convention of the Communist Party, U.S.A., was a revealing 4-day miniature prevue of what our Nation would become if those who aspire to become commissars of a Soviet America should ever fulfill their evil ambitions. It is apparent that, more than ever before, each American must maintain vigilant watchfulness toward this Trojan horse in our midst.

The 17th national convention is being hailed by the Communists themselves as a great milestone in the party's history in the United States.

These gains, recognized as formidable ones, are regarded by the party faithful as their chief accomplishments:

1. Promotion of Gus Hall, strongly pro-Russian and an energetic, aggressive leader, to the No. 1 position in the party;

2. Uniting the membership solidly behind the newly elected leadership, making the party a hard-hitting, mobile weapon against the free American Government;

3. Exploiting the current international political climate in an effort to make Russian policies more acceptable to American public opinion. This involves an attempt to exploit Soviet Premier Nikita S. Khrushchev's visit to the United States as a means of furthering its own schemes for bringing about a Soviet America;

4. Implemented a number of concrete programs aimed at increasing party membership and party influence in America. Such programs include increased emphasis on party recruiting, training of leaders, collection of funds, stepping up of party propaganda, and infiltration efforts into non-Communist organizations such as labor unions, Negro groups, national minorities, etc.

The newly elected "boss" of the Communist Party, U.S.A., Gus Hall, vaulted to the top post of the party through a combination of fortuitous circumstances and artful plotting. He has long been disgruntled at what he believed to be soft, ineffectual leadership in the party; but his ambitions have been hidden by the shadow of Eugene Dennis, national chairman and previously acknowledged leader of the party. As the date of the convention approached, Dennis still was top man in the party, although there was indication that Hall had nurtured a "dump Dennis" campaign to the point where Dennis' position was indeed a tenuous one. Then came the news that Dennis would be unable to attend the convention, that he had suffered a slight stroke, and that someone else would have to give the keynote address.

The scheming, opportunistic Hall rose to the occasion and delivered the address. He saw his ambition start to crystallize. Today he is communism's champion in the United States—a powerful, deceitful, dangerous foe of Americanism.

What sort of a man is Gus Hall? We in the FBI know him as a fanatical practitioner of Karl Marx' tenet that "the end justifies the means"; a coldly calculating Communist conniver who changes tactics as easily as he changed his name many years ago. He was born Arvo Halberg in 1910 at Virginia, Minn., the son of Matt and Susanna Halberg, both of whom later became charter members of the Communist Party. As a result of his early background of having been born into communism, many of his followers regard him as literally a man of destiny who can breathe new life into the party.

Hall joined the party in 1927 and went to Russia in 1931 to attend the Lenin School where students were taught, among other things, sabotage and guerrilla warfare techniques. After returning to this country in 1933, he became active in the Young Communist League as an organizer and in 1938 entered into full-time party work as a section organizer. As a Russian-taught disciple of Leninistic communism, Hall worked hard and rose swiftly into positions of increasing power. He was elected to the party's national committee in 1945 and became a national board member in 1947. In 1950, he was appointed national secretary, a move necessitated by the imprisonment of Eugene Dennis, who was then general secretary and who was found guilty of conspiring to violate the Smith Act of 1940.

Then, faced with confinement himself after being convicted for violation of the same act, Hall jumped $20,000 bond and became a fugitive. He dyed his blond hair, eyebrows, and eyelashes dark brown, shaved off his mustache, and shed 40 pounds in an unsuccessful effort to evade apprehension. Arrested by the FBI in 1951, Hall was sentenced to 3 years for contempt of court, making a total of 8 years when added to the 5-year sentence imposed for conspiracy to violate the Smith Act.

Conditionally released from prison in March 1957, Hall, after his probationary period ended on April 5, 1959, immediately resumed his nefarious aim of infecting America with communism.

This, then, is the man—exconvict, propagandist, unabashed emissary of evil, and rabid advocate of a Soviet United States.

Behind this Moscow-trained, utterly ruthless Communist leader, the 17th national convention formulated an organizational apparatus designed to make the Communist Party a hard-striking power against American society. A 60-member national committee was established with such veteran and hardened party leaders as Elizabeth Gurley Flynn, James Jackson, Hyman Lumer, Arnold Samuel Johnson, and Irving Potash. This national committee is theoretically the governing body of the party between conventions, but actual policy is made by the small ruling clique.

This small clique consists of the party's national officers (though a national executive committee is later to be established) who were elected after the convention by the national committee. The national officers are: William Z. Foster, chairman emeritus; Eugene Dennis, national chairman; Claude Lightfoot, vice chairman; Elizabeth Gurley Flynn, vice chairman; Benjamin J. Davis, national secretary; Gus Hall, general secretary; Hyman Lumer, national education secretary; James Jackson, national secretary for the South.

A five-man secretariat, consisting of Dennis, Hall, Davis, Lumer, and Jackson, will be the day-to-day operating authority of the party.

Although the positions of national chairman, national secretary, and general secretary theoretically are of equal importance, Hall is indisputably the new party chief. It will be remembered that Joseph Stalin once bore the title of general secretary of the Russian Communist Party—a position from which he became dictator of all communism.

Two important conclusions can be drawn from the national convention's leadership decisions:

(1) The party will remain in the future—as it has been in the past—an obedient slave of Moscow: No new personalities were brought into the party's top leadership. Rather, leadership is today exercised by the same corps of hardened, disciplined, veteran Communists who feel that Moscow represents the final goal of all of mankind's hopes. So-called rightwing Communists are not represented. They have either voluntarily resigned in complete disillusionment or been coldbloodedly purged. These rightwingers believed that the party in America should have some choice in its tactics of operation, not be completely bound by Moscow. This slight deviation cost them dearly. Communists should know there is only one road—that defined exclusively by Moscow.

Proof of the growing monolithic unity of the party is further shown in the changes made in the party's constitution by the convention. These changes eliminated features stemming from the previous convention which allowed greater freedom to local party units. The 1959 changes eliminated these rights and centralized control in national headquarters. They are in full accord with the historic Communist principle of democratic centralism which asserts that once a decision has been made in the party it must be carried out without dissent.

(2) The elimination of factionalism, making the party a more unified and more compact organization: Especially since the death of Stalin, the party has experienced factional disputes. These "factionalists" have now been liquidated or driven to cover. This was the theme of Gus Hall's summary remarks just before the end of the convention. Speaking with gusto, this new Communist commissar declared that "we" now have one policy, one line, and one direction. Interpreting the convention, Hall stated it gave a mandate to the leadership to completely destroy and burn out all elements of factionalism and that the leadership must carry out the mandate. Hence, in his words, the party cannot permit factionalism.

So, in the days ahead, we can expect an ever-increasing emphasis on party discipline, with all dissidents being eliminated. This is truly in the tradition of international communism which has no place for free speech and free thought.

Every action of the convention was designed to make the party a hard-hitting, versatile, and mobile weapon of attack against our form of government.

Why is the party so optimistic for the future? Why were Gus Hall and other Communists almost gleeful in speaking of Communist possibilities in the days ahead?

The answer comes from the convention proceedings—an answer which, like a thread, runs through all the remarks, actions, and hopes of the leadership. It is: that the recent visit of Premier Khrushchev to the United States has done much to create an atmosphere favorable to communism among Americans. In one convention discussion, for example, it was stated that as the result of the Khrushchev visit the American people have open minds toward socialism. Hence, the party must learn how to get socialism across to the people and break down misconceptions about the Soviet Union.

To party leaders, Khrushchev's presence in this country has eased the way for party activities. The Communists see the possibility of gaining still more influence in American society. Gus Hall, in his keynote speech on the convention's first day, was most sensitive to this point. He stated:

"The central question of this convention is: What is the role of the party in this entirely new situation? How can it now move out into the broad stream of the people's movement? How can it break the bonds of its isolation and become more and more effectively a factor in the life of our Nation?"

He then went on:

"We want to participate in, organize, and lead the broadest of united front movements—on every level—in a thousand ways, in 10,000 places, on 100,000 issues—if possible, with 180 million people."

Note the scope of Communist hopes—180 million people or the entire United States. The buoyant optimism of the party is geared to plans to take advantage of an international climate which, in their eyes, is aiding their work. Americans can look forward to a period of renewed party agitation in all fields—always hoping to increase party strength and influence. The Communists will endeavor to gain allies wherever they can be found, creating fronts, launching infiltration programs, participating in all phases of American life.

This new hope program of communism in the United States is geared to concrete programs both (1) building up the party apparatus itself, and (2) increasing party influence in the Nation as a whole.

Party leaders realize that a strong party organization is absolutely necessary to a successful agitation program. The convention adopted a number of programs to strengthen the internal operational structure of the party.

A resolution was adopted calling for the immediate launching of an intensive membership drive to run to May 1, 1960, aimed at increasing membership by 10 percent. This resolution outlined a program which calls for each party district to advise the national office by the end of January 1960, as to its specific plans for recruitment. To show the urgency of this task, the resolution asserted that each national committee member must adopt a personal quota of new recruits. In addition, each Communist Party club must adopt a quota. Moreover, each national officer will be designated to a specific district to aid in this nationwide recruitment program.

The training of party members also must be stepped up. This will mean more party schools. In the Communist Party, education (really meaning indoctrination) is of vital importance. Every member must be deeply imbued with the principles of Marx, Engels, and Lenin.

The convention also adopted reports about the status of the Worker, the party's weekly publication. It was pointed out that the Worker was the lifeblood of the party and that strengthening this paper must be one of the party's chief aims. The Worker does much to guide members, giving them the latest twists of the party line. Circulation of the Worker is now approximately 14,000, and the party wants it to be increased to 25,000 in 1960. The convention also accepted a resolution to the effect that the Daily Worker, which was discontinued in 1958, be reinstituted in the shortest possible time but preferably prior to the 1960 national elections in the United States. To the party, the Communist press represents one of its most effective methods of propaganda. In addition, it was recommended that the new national committee should set a date for the next fund drive, probably from January 13. 1960, to May 1, 1960. (The date of January 13 was selected as on this date in 1958 the Daily Worker was discontinued.)

Hence, the convention has given new guidance and enthusiasm to the party's recruiting, indoctrination, and propaganda campaigns. As one of the speakers stated, this was a convention to build the Communist Party, U.S.A.

COMMUNIST PARTY, U.S.A., FOLLOWS LENIN

Virtually every move taken at the 17th National Convention of the Communist Party, U.S.A., has its roots in the teachings of the early gods of communism. In 1902, Lenin wrote:

"We must go among all classes of the people as theoreticians, as propagandists, as agitators, and as organizers. The principal thing, of course, is propaganda and agitation among all strata of the people."

In 1920, Lenin was even more explicit regarding the manner in which the seed of communism was to be planted in fertile areas of unrest, dissension, and strife:

"Every sacrifice must be made, the greatest obstacles must be overcome, in order to carry on agitation and propaganda systematically, perseveringly, persistently, and patiently, precisely in those institutions, societies, and associations—even the most reactionary—to which proletarian or semiproletarian masses belong."

Naive, indeed, is the minority, class, or dissatisfied group which lets its banner pass into the hands of the Communists, for this banner will be held aloft by the Reds only so long as it serves the purpose of expediting the Communist objective of domination over all classes.

YOUTH

If for a moment any American considers the Communists to be blind to opportunity, let him consider this vile tactic which came out of the 17th national convention:

It is obvious to the Communists that, if its party is to survive, it must attract the youth of this Nation. As newspapers and other media reveal almost daily, many of America's juveniles are in a state of upheaval—adult authority and morality have been spurned to the point where juvenile arrests in this country in 1958 increased 8 percent over the preceding year.

During the convention, an Illinois Communist took note of the juvenile delinquency situation and proposed that if we provide them with a place to go and with activities they will not be so delinquent; we can move them in a positive direction.

What can be more despicable or dangerous to our democracy than this sort of Red Pied Piper trickery?

NEGROES

Another of the major aims of the 17th national convention was to reemphasize the recruitment of Negroes into the Communist Party by reembellishing the same old hackneyed phrases alleging that the Communist Party is the savior of the Negro. It is no secret that one of the bitterest disappointments of communistic efforts in this Nation has been their failure to lure our Negro citizens into the party. Despite every type of propaganda boomed at our Nation's Negro citizens, they have never succumbed to the party's saccharine promises of a Communist utopia. This generation and generations to come for many years owe a tremendous debt to our Negro citizens who have consistently refused to surrender their freedoms for the tyranny of communism.

Behind the Communists' scheme of recruiting Negroes is deceit as there is in every one of their designs. The Reds are not so interested in the Negro as they are in using him to further Communist goals. This is clearly shown by instructions issued by the Communist Party, U.S.A., to its members as early as 1925:

"The aim of our party in our work among the Negro masses is to create a powerful proletarian movement which will fight and lead the struggle of the Negro race against exploitation and oppression in every form and which will be a militant part of the revolutionary movement of the whole American working class, to strengthen the American revolutionary movement by bringing into it the * * * Negro workers and farmers in the United States to broaden the struggles of the American Negro workers and farmers, connect them with the struggles of the national minorities and colonial peoples of all the world and thereby further the cause of the world revolution and the dictatorship of the proletariat."

The Negro resolution adopted by the convention discarded the party's historic position advocating self-determination, meaning that Negroes should be given the right to form a separate nation in the Southern States. Stalin had defined "self-determination" in these words:

"The right of the oppressed peoples of the dependent countries and colonies to complete secession, as the right of nations to independent existence as states."

The 1959 convention resolution hence represents a party admission that its position concerning Negroes is bankrupt. Time itself has shown that the party is not interested in the welfare of the Negro, but only in using him as a tool to advance party interests.

OTHER MINORITIES

During the 17th national convention, much was made of the party's responsibility of championing the causes of such groups in the United States as the Mexicans, Japanese-Americans, Puerto Ricans, and a relatively new target, the American Indian. Again, such pseudo concern by the party is readily made apparent by its history of exploiting any area of unrest.

As early as 1921, the Communist International laid down the following rule to be followed by foreign Communist Parties affiliated with the Comintern:

"In countries whose population contains national minorities, it is the duty of the party to devote the necessary attention to propaganda and agitation among the proletarian strata of these minorities."

The choice of the words "propaganda" and "agitation" belies any "noble" motive which those who are easily beguiled might ascribe to the international Communist conspiracy.

LABOR UNIONS

The 17th national convention reaffirmed the party's constant aim of attempting to infiltrate and dominate labor unions to turn them into a tool for communism—to make them recruiting areas for additional members in the Communist movement.

The 17th national convention's 10-page draft resolution on trade union problems contains the pious statement that—"that fact that Communists have no interests apart from those of the entire working class must be brought home to the American workers again and again."

Actually, the party's burning desire to grab control of labor unions is nothing more than an attempt to carry out one of Lenin's most necessary rules to achieve communism:

"It is necessary to be able to withstand all of this, to agree to any, and every sacrifice, and even—if need be—to resort to all sorts of devices, maneuvers, and illegal methods, to evasion, and subterfuge, in order to penetrate into the trade unions, to remain in them, and to carry on Communist work in them at all costs."

Certainly, the Communists' glittering generalities of "freeing the workingman" and securing "better working conditions" for him can never take the place of the free bargaining system under our democracy. No semantic windowdressing will ever disguise the true objective of communism—to make slaves of workingmen.

The man masterminding the party's unscrupulous attempts at infiltrating labor unions is Irving Potash, national labor secretary. His sordid background indeed makes a farce of the party's claim that it has no interests apart from those of the entire working class. Born in Russia in 1902, he has an arrest record dating back to 1919 for criminal anarchy, conspiracy to influence and intimidate witnesses, conspiracy to teach and advocate the overthrow of the U.S. Government by force and violence, and illegal reentry into this country.

Potash has been dedicated to the Communist movement since his early youth and has been described by a party comrade as "a guy who has never betrayed the party line." In 1931, he placed his own picture on a passport issued to another person and utilized this passport to travel to Russia to attend the Lenin School. Although Potash has stated that he considers America his home, there is no indication he has made any efforts to obtain U.S. citizenship in the 46 years he has called America his homeland. He has, however, frequently and consistently invoked the constitutional privileges of an American citizen when questioned by various congressional committees regarding his Communist Party membership and activities.

FARMERS

In considering what position the Communist Party, U.S.A., will take during the 1960 political campaign, those in attendance at the 17th national convention were provided with a document containing a 10-point program, which the party would support. One of these concerning farmers is ridiculous per se when examined in the light of the ultimate aim of communism. Despite the slaves in the communes of Communist China and the state-owned collective farms and farm machinery in Soviet Russia, the Communists in America have the effrontery to intone sanctimoniously that the Communist Party, U.S.A., will support a program which will "protect the rights of the small farmers to their land and their implements."

What else could such a program be but one small, but expedient, step toward the sovietization of American farmers? Who can conceive of farmers being allowed to own their farms and machinery in the type of society advocated by Communists whose very name connotes a social order in which all goods are held in common by a single authoritarian party?

POLITICAL ELECTIONS

Communists know that apathy among American citizens is the chink in democracy's armor. One of the speakers at the 17th national convention revealed the basic Communist tactic of taking advantage of every weakness when he urged members of the Communist Party, U.S.A., to move in the primaries since 90 percent of the Congressmen are elected at the primaries.

The convention heard a report of a five-man committee which had made a study of what the party could do in the 1960 elections. It advocated, among other things, influencing both major political parties. Also, it recommended that the party attempt to exploit labor and Negro groups to wield independent political influence. This report was adopted by the convention.

EDUCATION

The Communist Party remains deeply interested in the American college student. At a press conference, Gus Hall was asked if the party had made any inroads among college students. He replied that the party had made gains in this field, adding that there has been a change in the thinking of college students toward nonconformity. Hall added that he based this comment on the fact that a number of requests have been received from colleges for speakers.

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

As evidence of the fact that the Communist Party, U.S.A., is a part of the international Communist conspiracy, the convention received greetings from 50 Communist Parties in foreign countries. Most prominent, of course, were the messages received from the Communist Parties in Russia and China.

A motion adopted by the convention reflects another area of growing Communist concern. This motion instructed the new national committee to create a subcommittee on Latin American affairs. Another motion called for an appeal to the conscience of the American people to give support to the "revolutionary" movement developing in Latin America.

In the days ahead, the party can be expected to give increasing emphasis to Latin American matters. Joseph North, foreign affairs editor of the Worker, gave a report to the convention on Castro and the Cuban situation. He praised the progress that has been made by the Cuban Government and said that the agrarian land reform has made the farmers more prosperous than they were before the revolution.

Juan Santos Rivera, president of the Communist Party of Puerto Rico, addressed the convention. He extended his best wishes for success to the Communist Party, U.S.A. The party was most enthusiastic over Rivera's appearance.

COMMUNISM AND THE PRESS

One of the paradoxes at the convention was the fact the convention was closed to the press, this in spite of the party's old, old theme that the Communist Party fights for freedom. When queried by a reporter as to why the convention was not open to the press, Hall blithely stated that the party has received unfavorable treatment from the press in the past and also because there were delegates in attendance who might lose their jobs if their identities became known. Of course, the real reason the press was not admitted was because the party does not dare let its illegal aims against the United States become public. The exclusion of the press is a tacit admission that the Communist Party, U.S.A., is a clandestine, far from legitimate organization, and that if the free press cannot praise communism, then there is no room at Communist conventions for the press. His feelings regarding the purpose of the press are revealing, too, as to what place the fourth estate would have in a society dominated by the Communist Party.

However, veteran newspapermen are not easily fooled, and some of Hall's answers to questions posed by the reporters quickly exposed him. For instance, Hall was asked if the Communist Party, U.S.A., advocates the violent overthrow of the U.S. Government. Hall, convicted in Federal court for conspiring to do just that—Hall, who once openly testified that he was willing to take up arms to bring about a Soviet America, blandly said without hesitation, "No, we have never advocated this."

THE SENATE DEMOCRATIC POLICY COMMITTEE

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD], the assistant majority leader, last week had a colloquy with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK]. In the course of that colloquy some very important information was elicited from the Senator from Montana. I should like to follow that up, since the Senator from Montana is now present on the floor.

I refer to a speech that was made last year, March 9, in which a colloquy took place between the Senator from Montana and myself. The Senator from Montana at one point said this:

> The Senator knows that under the law there are only seven members on the policy committee. If the Senator from Wisconsin wants to have that committee expanded, I suggest he introduce a measure to that effect. I assure him it will be given the most earnest and serious consideration. At the present time the committee is stymied as to the number of its members. So far as I am concerned, I am merely a file closer. I am an ex officio member.

It is my understanding and I hope the Senator from Montana will correct me if the situation is now different.

While other members of the committee may be ex officio members, who are not among the seven referred to by the Senator from Montana, they have a vote, and they have the same powers as the regular members of the policy committee; there is no difference except that they were appointed at a later date. Is that correct?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin is correct. Under the law there are only seven members of the policy committee, and that includes the leader, the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON]. However, beginning with Senator Barkley, the secretary of the majority at the present time, the position being held by the distinguished senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS], and the whip or assistant leader, the position held by me, were added as ex officio members, and that has been the situation down to the present time.

The majority leader, the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON], instead of looking upon us as ex officio members who merely participate, has allowed us every leeway he possibly could in discussions and voting. Last year he extended the membership still further by bringing into the policy committee the three members of the calendar committee, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. HART], the Senator from Alaska [Mr. BARTLETT], and the Senator from California [Mr. ENGLE], and he has given them the same privileges a regular member on the committee has. So what we have in effect at the present time is a 12-man committee, although under the law only 7 are supposed to be members.

Mr. PROXMIRE. So the fact is that the senior Senator from Texas, the majority leader, has extended the power of voting on the policy committee to five additional members, who, according to the law as it was passed, are not designated as members of the policy committee. Is that correct?

Mr. MANSFIELD. That is true. In the case of two, he was carrying out a policy inaugurated by the former majority leader, Mr. Barkley, at the time the so-called policy committee was set up in 1947; and, on his own initiative, to give a wider representation, I suppose, he brought into the policy committee the three members of the calendar committee, who sit with us regularly, and have for over a year.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I wanted to reinforce that impression, as to whether the members of the calendar committee had power to vote on all occasions. I think the statement of the Senator from Montana has made the situation perfectly clear. I called the Library of Congress on that question. They checked with the Democratic National Committee. I do not know why the Library should have checked with the Democratic National Committee——

Mr. MANSFIELD. That is the advisory committee.

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Library received word that the ex officio members of the policy committee do not vote. The Senator from Montana has clarified that aspect. I am glad that fact has been made a matter of public information.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I am delighted the Senator from Wisconsin has brought this matter up, but I thought it was a matter of public information. I assure the Senator that, so far as the members of the calendar committee are concerned, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. HART], the Senator from Alaska [Mr. BARTLETT], and the Senator from California [Mr. ENGLE], they have a vote and they know they have a vote. Their views are asked, and they participate in matters affecting proposed legislation reported by the standing committees of the Senate.

THE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the New York Times has a massive sense of history which is brilliantly condensed in a 3-minute thumbnail summary of the news every morning in the Times' daily news summary and index. Yesterday morning the first two news events summarized under the caption "National" bear an interesting relationship. I will read them without comment:

NATIONAL

His finger poised in the air for emphasis, Vice President NIXON opened his 1960 campaign against the Democrats by challenging Senator JOHN F. KENNEDY's concept of the Presidency. In Florida for his first speaking appearance since announcing his own candidacy, Mr. NIXON said the Senator, also a declared candidate, seemed to confuse presidential table pounding with strong leadership. The Vice President defended the Eisenhower record and set forth his own list of qualities the next President should have.

President Eisenhower spent the entire day out in the fields in Georgia hunting elusive quail. Shotgun blasts and the yelping of bird dogs set up a commotion, the like of which had scarcely been known since a hurricane all but leveled the nearby town of Albany in 1940. When it was all over, the President had bagged his legal limit of 12 birds.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, with reference to the remarks of the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE], discussing the Presidency, and his remarks about the President, particularly calling attention to the weekend vacation he has taken, I wish to comment briefly.

The President of the United States needs no defense from me. Criticism of or debate about the concept of the Presidency or the President's policies is a matter within the competence of this body and of the American people. But from time to time some Members rise in this body and comment on the fact that the President has taken a weekend vacation, that he may play golf, that he may shoot, or that he may hunt. I do not derogate the character or the qualities of the Senator from Wisconsin, but I must say that in my view such remarks are in bad taste and wholly uncalled for.

Even for a man who has had no sickness at any time, one serving as President of the United States, one who bears the tremendous burdens of that Office, deserves to have a rest now and then, even often, and it is good for the country.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COOPER. The President, who has had a heart attack and another serious illness, and who has come back from those illnesses to serve this country with devotion to duty, deserves and has the approbation of the people of this country.

Whatever may be said, it is a fact that the President is at a peak of public approval in this country and throughout the world. It is doubtful if any President of the United States ever before enjoyed the confidence of the people of this country and of the people of the world that President Eisenhower enjoys.

I hesitated to give any notice to such comments, but I must say that in the last 2 or 3 years I have heard these statements, and at times they affront me, not simply because I happen to be a member of the President's party, but it affronts my sense of taste. I believe the people of this country are affronted also.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COOPER. I should like to finish.

The President of the United States serves 12 months a year, every day of the month. We in the Congress have our vacations, and we take them pretty often. We have recesses, and Members travel all over the world, at Government expense. I am sure these Members work hard, but they are traveling much of the time on vacations.

The President of the United States has no such vacation. He is working constantly. The decisions which he has to make—which we talk about but do not have to make—weigh upon him heavily and affect the Nation and the world.

I wish to say to my friend from Wisconsin and to other members on the other side of the aisle, for 3 years, some of you have talked about finance and what ought to be done, defense and foreign policy and what ought to be done, but the chief result of all their talk has been declarations employing such adjectives as "imaginative, bold, new programs." Neither from their side of the aisle in the Senate nor from their party on the outside have they yet been able to come up with any program—other than criticism and critical remarks—and you have had neither the support of your own party in the Congress or the support of the people of the United States.

Again I say, I am in favor of debate upon all public issues. We have a perfect right to debate these questions—not only the right, but the responsibility. But these little personal remarks are tiring.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, since the Senator commented on an insertion I made in the RECORD, I should appreciate the opportunity of replying briefly.

The remarks of the Senator from Kentucky seem to me simply incredible. I have never engaged in any personal attack on the President. What I did was to read into the RECORD a summary from the New York Times, which is certainly a fair, dispassionate, objective, and competent newspaper.

Republicans have become so inordinately sensitive about the President that they cry out in protest against any recitation of the facts. And, Mr. President, how could any Senator be more precisely factual than I have been. I have simply taken a factual summary from a newspaper that is internationally known for its absolute fidelity to the facts, and I have asked that it be printed—that is all.

I read one item, and then I read the item immediately following, and I sat down. I made no comment on it whatsoever.

The New York Times pointed out that the Vice President of the United States said the Eisenhower record was a strong record, and printed right below the fact that the President was quail shooting. I did not draw any conclusion from that. This was in the New York Times, and was considered to be extremely newsworthy and pertinent. I simply leave it to the American people and to all Senators to draw whatever conclusions they wish to draw from it.

TENDENCY OF STAND OF CHANCELLOR ADENAUER TO ENCOURAGE MOB VIOLENCE IN GERMANY

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, it is not my usual custom to speak about events in other countries, but I feel I must speak out on the issue of anti-Semitism in Germany

We all recall too vividly how Adolf Hitler rose to power using anti-Semitism as a lever and then plunged Germany and the entire world into the grim holocaust of senseless war. It is not my purpose today to detail the horrows that Hitler cast upon this planet.

I do desire to register my concern about the advice Chancellor Konrad Adenauer is reported to have given his people on the recent outbreak of anti-Semitism. He is reported by the Washington Post and Times Herald for Sunday, January 17, 1960, to have said in a nationwide TV-radio speech:

> To my German fellow citizens as a whole I say: If you catch a hooligan anywhere, carry out the punishment on the spot and beat him up. That is the punishment he deserves.

I hope that, upon quiet deliberation, Chancellor Konrad Adenauer will rescind this advice. I am confident the German government has the legal means and the lawful capabilities to suppress hooligans of any sort without inviting mob action. Government should not encourage violence.

For a leader of government to urge his people to take on the role of policemen, prosecutors, juries and judges, is to invite anarchy—the complete breakdown of justice, with harm to innocent people. This is what the ruthless Nazis did in the 1930's.

How well can a mob—or a few emotional citizens—provide justice on the spot? The answer is that they cannot and they should not try to.

I express the earnest hope that the good people of Germany will show the world that they respect the rights of their fellow man. This will require that any and all violations of human decency be handled in a manner which gives the accused a fair trial, presided over by officials of the German Government and its subsidiaries.

I particularly hope that those German citizens who are of the Jewish faith will carefully abstain from taking the law into their own hands. Violators of the law should be promptly handed over to the proper authorities—not manhandled. There must be government by law.

Only by faith in lawful procedures will Germans escape a return to the pain road that Hitler led them down. His faulty creed was well set forth in "Mein Kampf," when he said:

> The very first essential for success is a perpetually constant and regular employment of violence.

The bombed ruins that still exist in Germany challenge that advice.

Germans must show that law and order prevail and that violence will be met by the rule of law. But beyond this the German people must show that they will not turn their eyes away and pretend not to see what their eyes see well or pretend not to hear what their ears hear plainly. To ignore vicious and debasing evils are to condone and—yes—to support them.

The German nation must actively demonstrate a national purpose based upon genuine respect for the rights of all people. No other route will save them from the anarchy that breeds a Hitler and the destruction that follows a Hitler. The well-being of Germany lies in showing unity to protect human rights by lawful means. The danger is discord caused by disregard for man's inherent rights. I know that the intentions of Chancellor Adenauer are of the best. His motives are high and pure; and yet I fear it is a basic mistake for a great national leader like Mr. Adenauer to condone mob violence in the slightest degree. Upon reflection, he himself—wise man that he is—may reach a similar conclusion.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the article from the Washington Post and Times Herald of January 17, 1960.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CARLSON in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon?

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WEST GERMANS TOLD TO BEAT "HOOLIGANS"—ADENAUER PLEDGES STATE BACKING TO JEWS IN TV TALK

BONN, JANUARY 16. — Chancellor Konrad Adenauer advised West German citizens tonight to beat up any anti-Jewish holligans they find smearing walls with Nazi symbols.

Such punishment on the spot is what the hooligans deserve for disgracing Germany and causing a wave of hatred for Germans abroad, Adenauer said in a nationwide radio-TV address. He told German Jews they have nothing to fear, that he personally guaranteed that the power of the German state stands behind them.

Nazism has no roots in West Germany and its incorrigible followers are few, Adenauer said. He pledged that the movement never will make a comeback.

The anti-Semitic incidents have been strongly condemned by the whole German people, Adenauer said.

There was a marked lapse across Germany in the rash of vandalism that, breaking out at a Cologne synagogue Christmas eve, has spread to far corners of the world. None has been reported on German soil for 48 hours. Authorities speculated that bitterly cold weather is keeping swastika-smearers indoors.

Adenauer told the German people that most of the incidents, in Germany and elsewhere, seem due to hooliganism without any political background, but the Cologne outrage appears to be of a political nature.

"To my German fellow citizens as a whole I say: If you catch a hooligan anywhere, carry out the punishment on the spot and beat him up. That is the punishment he deserves."

In Saarbruecken, meantime, a torchlight procession of 500 people marched to the site of a former Nazi concentration camp to protest the recent neo-Nazi outbursts. Earlier, at a rally there, speakers urged that German schoolchildren be told more of Nazi crimes. A French movie on concentration camp atrocities was shown.

THE FEDERAL BUDGET FOR FISCAL YEAR 1961

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Mr. President, the President's estimate of a budget surplus in excess of $4 billion on June 30, 1961, cannot be accepted or regarded as an accomplished fact. From experience I know accurate budget estimates 18 months in advance are extremely rare.

A surplus was also estimated originally for last fiscal year—ended June 30; and the Government closed the year with a deficit of $12.5 billion—the biggest peacetime deficit in history. During the 18-month period involved the Federal debt limit was raised three times.

Following the recent state of the Union message, there are already some who are planning to reduce taxes, increase spending, and do both in anticipation of surplus which is by no means certain. The Nation should be warned that this would be fiscal irresponsibility.

From the President's statement it was obvious that he was relying on increased revenue—not expenditure reduction—to produce the surplus he forecast.

Revenue totaling $84 billion in the coming year would be an increase of $15.7 billion over collections last year, or an increase of 23 percent in 2 years. Such an increase would be difficult without heavy inflation. Inflation of such proportions is certain to increase Government costs.

If a surplus develops, I agree with the President that it should be applied to the Federal debt, which this month reached its all time peak.

Preliminary examination of the Federal Budget for fiscal year 1961, beginning next July 1, submitted by the President to Congress today, shows the following:

1. Budget in general

[In billions]

	1959	1960	1961
Receipts	$68.3	$78.6	$84.0
Expenditures	80.7	78.4	79.8
Deficit (−) or surplus (+)	−12.4	+.2	+4.2
Appropriations and other new spending authority	81.4	79.7	79.4

These estimates contemplate $554 million from increased postal rates (1 cent in first-class and airmail rates, etc.) and $140 million in other charges, fees, transfers, etc., requiring legislation. If these changes are not enacted, expenditures and appropriations would be increased by $694 million, and the surplus would be reduced by the same amount.

One-half cent increase in highway gas tax is proposed, but this is without effect on the general fund. The Byrd amendment (pay as we go) would control.

2. Receipts breakdown

[In billions]

	1959	1960	1961
Individual income	$36.7	$40.3	$43.7
Corporate income	17.3	22.2	23.5
Excise	8.5	9.1	9.5
Other	5.8	7.0	7.3
Total	68.3	78.6	84.0

Total collections would be up 23 percent over 1959 and 7 percent over this year. Individual income tax collections would be 19 percent over 1959 and 8 percent over this year. Corporate income tax collections would be 35 percent over 1959 and 6 percent over this year. Excise taxes would be 12 percent over 1959 and 4 percent over this year.

The revenue estimate, of course, contemplates continuation of present excise and corporate income taxe rates.

3. Expenditure breakdown

[In billions]

	1959	1960	1961
National security	$44.1	$43.9	$43.8
Foreign aid, etc.	6.1	3.9	4.0
Domestic-civilian	33.3	34.8	35.7

Domestic-civilian figures include roads and FNMA; they are up more than 86 percent over the expenditures at the end of the Korean war.

4. Interest: 1959—$7.7 billion; 1960—$9.4 billion; 1961—$9.6 billion. Another temporary increase in the Federal debt ceiling will be requested for seasonal excesses.

5. Unexpended balances at the start of fiscal year 1961 will total $71.8 billion; $38.5 billion obligated and $33.3 billion unobligated. 1961 expenditures out of prior year authorizations are estimated at $26.3 billion.

6. Notes: Revenue proposals include continuation of existing corporate and excise rates; equitable co-op taxes; prevention of excessive depletion allowances; revision of taxes on gains from sale of depreciable personal property; increase in aviation fuel tax and transfer to general fund; repeal of interest rate ceiling; deferral of taxes on income derived from less-developed areas abroad; postponement of cuts in transportation and telephone tax rates. The item veto is proposed. Effort is made to bring foreign currencies under control. Backdoor spending is reduced and sharply criticized. Extension of Corporation Control Act is recommended. Transfer of forest and public land highways to trust fund is proposed.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Mr. President, an increase of nearly $1 billion in domestic-civilian expenditures is estimated in the Federal budget submitted to Congress today.

Including highways and FNMA, domestic-civilian expenditures in fiscal year 1961 are estimated at $35.7 billion, as compared with the estimate of $34.8 billion in the current year.

The 1961 estimate represents an 86-percent increase in Federal spending, outside of defense, atomic energy, and foreign-aid categories, since the end of the Korean war.

If there is to be a surplus, it will not result from expenditure reduction.

A breakdown showing the increase in domestic-civilian expenditures follows:

Federal expenditures, fiscal years 1954–61, broken categorically to show national security, foreign aid, etc., and domestic-civilian

[1] Since 1954 expenditures for Federal National Mortgage Association and highways have been dropped from the general budget and converted into so-called trust funds—FNMA in 1955 and highways in 1957. Commerce and housing figures and affected totals above are adjusted to include these figures throughout for complete and accurate comparison over the period. For this reason the President's budget shows total expenditures estimated at $79.8 billion for fiscal year 1961 and the above table shows $83.5 billion. The $3,654 million difference is entirely in FNMA and highway expenditures—$800 million for FNMA and $2,854 million for highways.

ANNOUNCED RETIREMENT OF SENATOR THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN, OF RHODE ISLAND

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, in the week since my beloved colleague, Senator THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN, of Rhode Island, announced his decision not to be a candidate for reelection, the flood of praise for this statesman's contribution to our times has been a refreshing chapter in the usually competitive existence that is the American political scene.

To this volume may I add the editorial judgment of numerous outstanding newspapers and ask unanimous consent that the following editorials and articles be printed in the RECORD:

The Woonsocket Call for Wednesday, January 13, 1960, entitled "Senator GREEN Has Had Distinguished Career."

The Providence Visitor for Friday, January 15, 1960, entitled "Moral Courage and Public Life."

New York Times for Thursday, January 14, 1960, entitled "Senator GREEN calls It a Day."

Louisville Courier-Journal for Thursday, January 14, 1960, entitled "Senator GREEN Plans a Suitable Exit."

Providence Journal for Thursday, January 14, 1960, entitled "In Praise of Senator GREEN."

Pawtucket Times for Thursday, January 14, 1960, entitled "Senator GREEN Steps Down."

Worcester (Mass.) Evening Gazette for Thursday, January 14, 1960, entitled "Senator GREEN Calls It Quits."

Newport Daily News for Tuesday, January 12, 1960, entitled "Senator GREEN To Retire."

Kansas City Star for Wednesday, January 13, 1960, entitled "Senator GREEN Misses a Goal by 7 Years."

Bristol (R.I.) Phoenix for Friday, January 15, 1960, entitled "Senator GREEN."

There being no objection, the articles and editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Woonsocket Call, Jan. 13, 1960]

SENATOR GREEN HAS HAD DISTINGUISHED CAREER

It comes to few men in the field of politics to enjoy as full a life as THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN has packed into his 92 years. Now the oldest man ever to sit in the U.S. Senate has decided, for reasons of health, to forgo the political arena and leave it to others to succeed him as one of Rhode Island's two representatives to the upper Chamber. As he leaves public office he will take with him the affection and good wishes of the citizens he has represented so faithfully.

To say that Senator GREEN has been a statesman of the first rank is not to use words carelessly. He brought with him to both the governorship of Rhode Island and the Senate, where he has served since 1937, a background steeped in the best New England tradition. He is a man of erudition as well as political acumen.

His abilities were properly recognized when he finally became chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, possibly the most important Senate assignment in recent years. He served in that capacity until impaired health forced him to step down.

But as he represented the United States in broad fields he never lost touch with his constituency; the people whom he has represented in Rhode Island. It might be fair to say that Rhode Island has been his first love only after the Senate and more than likely it has not been easy for him to decide to leave that distinguished group which likes to be known as the world's most exclusive club.

While Senator GREEN has announced his intention not to seek reelection, he will, of course, continue to serve during this final session of the 86th Congress.

The healthy vote always accorded Mr. GREEN here in Woonsocket is indicative of the esteem in which he is held by this community. Our people, therefore, will wish him well and join with his colleague, Senator PASTORE, in expressing the hope that "the Lord will grant THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN many more years of happiness and health."

[From the Providence Visitor, Jan. 15, 1960]

MORAL COURAGE AND PUBLIC LIFE

Rhode Island has had many reasons to be proud of its senior Senator, a man whose long life has been marked by notable attainments in law, scholarship, business, finance, and public service. His studies at the Universities of Bonn and Berlin and his teaching of Roman law at Brown gave early evidence of the objectivity and breadth of his outlook.

His labors on behalf of the public good during his two terms as Governor, his efforts to promote the further development of the Library of Congress, and his very able handling of his duties in connection with the Committee on Foreign Relations have all won him deserved acclaim. But his act of relinquishing his cherished hope to continue his career in the Senate stands out not only as an evidence of his understanding of the limitations that come with the years but also of his unfailing sense of civic responsibility and his desire to serve the people of Rhode Island, as he will continue to do in his capacity as a private citizen and a senior statesman.

SENATOR GREEN CALLS IT A DAY

In politics, distinction does not automatically come with age, as it seems to do in some other fields. And it has not come automatically to Senator THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN—it has been earned. Senator GREEN's announcement that he would not seek reelection draws to a close a tenure characterized by wisdom.

That Senator GREEN, at 92, has become the oldest Senator in our history is remarkable, but more remarkable still is the fact that his entire senatorial career, marked most outstandingly by his tour as chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, has been carved out after the age of 70. Senator GREEN was born in Providence in 1867. After his graduation from Brown University he taught Roman law there during the nineties. He assumed a number of diversified business interests in Rhode Island and began working in State politics in 1907.

The striking aspect of Senator GREEN's career is its continuity. He maintains old business associations. A graduate of and teacher at Brown, he is now connected as trustee. Born in Providence, he has a home there still. Obviously this is a man who sinks roots—and not to lie dormant but to grow. His decision to retire was made, he says, "after considerable thought." It was a mental tussle, obviously for a man who hates to cut ties. The Senate—and the country—will miss his services.

[From the Louisville Courier-Journal, Jan. 14, 1960]

SENATOR GREEN PLANS A SUITABLE EXIT

One of the hardest things about a career in politics is knowing when to quit. That fine art has been demonstrated by THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN of Rhode Island, who has let it be known that he will retire from the U.S. Senate when his term ends next January.

Senator GREEN is 92 years old. He is the oldest man who has ever served in the Senate, but he is one of those rare individuals whose mental and physical vigor remained with him into his ninth decade. The sight of his spare figure darting around a tennis court is a matter of only recent memory in Washington.

But time moves on, even when its progress has seemed almost magically delayed. The Senator has had to have an operation on his eyes, and his hearing has begun to fail. A year ago he voluntarily surrendered the chairmanship of the Foreign Relations Committee to the man next in line, the amply qualified Senator FULBRIGHT. Now he announces that his fourth full term in the Senate will be his last. Rhode Island will find it hard to replace so genial and influential a spokesman, but any State would be proud of a Senator who prepares to leave public office in the same way he occupied it—with dignity.

[From the Providence (R.I.) Journal, Jan. 14, 1960]

IN PRAISE OF SENATOR GREEN

(By William S. White)

WASHINGTON.—The old, old man is going at last from the Senate.

In the 93d year of his life, Senator THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN, of Rhode Island, has announced he will not seek reelection to his fifth term because he does not feel well enough.

He is not, of course, indispensable. And a man can work only so long as strength remains. Too, his State will have no trouble in finding a replacement.

All the same, when THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN leaves, the Senate will be the poorer, in the strictly human sense anyhow, for his departure. For oddly, in this correspondent's time, it has been mainly the very old men there who have given a special quality to the place.

There, more often than not, it is the very old who will take the greatest risks, who are the least influenced by today's universal urge for personal security, who are the most ready to run forward to meet the possibly menacing tomorrow. They are, again more often than not, the best of the individual men, the free and fighting spirits who make the youngsters look rather like conscientious objectors.

To be sure, "the problems of the aged"—which is a nice-Nelly phrase admitting that society tends to throw the aged upon the ash heap—exists in the Senate, too. Even there, men can grow too old to go on any more—but happily it takes an awfully long time to grow that old in the Senate.

Senator GREEN at a mere 70 carried not simply a full load but a great load, as a personally aristocratic and privileged man who went all the way with the Roosevelt New Deal.

Senator GREEN at a ripe 80 was tough enough and strong enough to take on one of the hardest and most thankless jobs the Senate had handed out in this century.

This was to serve on the first committee that investigated Senator Joseph McCarthy's charges of communism in the State Department. Nobody could hope to win in that mare's nest—nobody but, in the short run, Senator McCarthy himself. Fear and suspicion were loose in a country that had suffered great and undeniable setbacks from imperialist communism. The Nation was ready for a devil hunt; it was all there to be exploited.

But Senator GREEN, unlike some of his committee colleagues, faced the unalterable facts with that special candor and realism of the Senate's aged men. He knew Senator McCarthy and his associates were making a bitter brew that at length would spill over on the Republicans—as well it did when the Eisenhower administration came to power. But he knew that, first of all, Senator McCarthy was reaching for the throat not simply of President Truman and Dean Acheson but of the Democratic Party which Senator GREEN loved.

So, full of the self-honesty of the old Senate types, Senator T. F. GREEN, from the first moment, made no pretense to an objectivity that could not exist there. From the first moment he hit Senator McCarthy with everything to which he could lay hand.

He was a true liberal, as distinguished from a knee-jerk liberal, and he was a loyal liberal, instead of a cut-and-run liberal.

He stayed with President Truman in the good times, and also in the bad times. In the times, indeed, when some of the knee-jerk liberals were rushing self-righteously into print (to coin a sparkling phrase) to run out on a liberal President who had represented the views which they always had said were also their own. But this was a President who also now had the bad luck to get into trouble. So though they were just terribly, terribly liberal they also managed to be terribly, terribly safe.

It was only the true liberals like Senator GREEN, plus some nonliberals who believed in most but not all of what he was doing, who stood with President Truman when the heavy firing about corruption and cronyism broke out.

Mr. Truman never has hated, or even much disliked, all those who had fought him from conviction, the Republicans and the ultra-conservative Democrats. But he has an unforgettable contempt for those who really agreed with his policies but prudently left the firing line when it became evident that his troops were going to be overborne.

Aging Senator GREEN may have been intellectually wrong in staying in the line to the end. But he was a combat soldier, and not a talking soldier. He had guts. You knew where he stood; not just some of the time but all of the time.

[From the Pawtucket Times, Jan. 14, 1960]

SENATOR GREEN STEPS DOWN

Now that THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN prepares to leave the political stage there are those who wonder if there will ever be another public figure just like the venerable Senator. Most unlikely, seems to be the answer to those who wonder. Senator GREEN is a unique figure, an unusual and delightful person, as many will attest.

Of Senator GREEN's political contemporaries not one was more steadfast to the ideals of the Democratic Party in the face of political foemen who could not hold a candle to the integrity of the Senator, who made an open profession of his politics.

There was a time when the Democratic Party "was" THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN. Only he and a comparative handful of followers persevered to keep intact the framework of the party. After a long series of campaign disappointments lightning struck in 1932 and THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN was swept into the State capitol as Governor while the New Deal was inundating Washington. From the vantage point of the executive offices the Governor made the Democrats dominant in Rhode Island by engineering the political coup which swept Republicans from power. Elected to the U.S. Senate the former Governor continued to exercise an influence in Rhode Island as well as in the foreign affairs of the United States for he was a member of powerful Senate committees. So great was his prestige and so acceptable his leadership there were no Rhode Island Democrats willing to challenge his right to return to the Senate, even though nature was taking its toll of the oldest man ever to sit in the U.S. Senate.

So long has Senator GREEN been a Democrat and so long has he had the last word in party affairs that comparative newcomers to the party should not discount the Senator, even in retirement. Nor should anyone question his right to dictate because he bore the heat of the battle in the days when Democrats were very much in the minority. One of the most puzzling things about THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN is that as a man born to high estate, he chose to throw his lot with those of humble birth, with those who lacked the cultural background which set Senator GREEN apart.

The man who might have been a Cabinet member, or an Ambassador, chose, for reasons best known to himself, the rough and tumble of partisan politics, perhaps in the belief that he too could make a contribution to the State to which his forebears had contributed so much.

[From the Worcester (Mass.) Evening Gazette, Jan. 14, 1960]

SENATOR GREEN CALLS IT QUITS

Time catches up with all men sooner or later. It has caught up at last with Senator THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN, of Rhode Island, who says that he will not run for the Senate next November after all.

At 92, Senator GREEN is the oldest man ever to serve in Congress. His sight and his hearing are not as good as they used to be. But the Senator still astounds his colleagues with his vigor and perception of what is going on.

No one will begrudge Senator GREEN his retirement. He deserves to take it easy. But his leaving the Capitol scene will be something like the departure of the Washington Monument. He is a fixture, and an honorable one. He has served long and ably in the Senate. As chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations until just a few months ago, he consistently showed good judgment, a serene temperament, and the wisdom that comes from vast experience.

As he goes into somewhat unwelcome retirement, he has the warm regards of well-wishers all over the Nation. The Senate will not be quite the same without THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN. He has served in it with distinction and style.

[From the Newport Daily News, Jan. 12, 1960]

SENATOR GREEN TO RETIRE

Senator THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN'S announcement that he will not stand for reelection, removes from Congress next January the oldest man ever to serve there and from active politics in Rhode Island one who has been a tower of strength in the Democratic Party for many years.

Senator GREEN, in his 92 years, has had a remarkable career. We generally think first of him in a political role. But it must not be forgotten that over the years he has been prominent in the State's business, civic, and social life. He is a patron of the arts and a world traveler. Professionally a lawyer, at one time he was on the faculty of Brown University, his alma mater.

When he attained the position of oldest Member ever to serve in Congress, he remarked he'd like to serve until he was 100. For several months, however, the feeling has been growing that an announcement he would not seek renomination for a fifth term was imminent. Failing eyesight and hearing led to his decision to retire.

The Senator's declaration, read to the Democratic State committee last night, ordinarily would have left the nomination open to the field. But with former Gov. Dennis J. Roberts practically nominating Congressman JOHN E. FOGARTY of the Second District for the place, what might have been spirited competition was cut off, until Mr. FOGARTY speaks out.

How Congressman FOGARTY will consider this opportunity for promotion to the upper Chamber remains to be seen. In his 19 years in the House, he has attained considerable seniority in the House Appropriations Committee. He has sponsored and is developing important national programs in the fields of health, education, welfare, and labor. The Senate offers greater prestige, but Mr. FOGARTY would face difficulties in continuing programs so close to his heart.

[From the Kansas City Star, Jan. 13, 1960]

SENATOR GREEN MISSES A GOAL BY 7 YEARS

In Senator THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN'S decision to retire from the Senate at the close of his present term there is the human tragedy of frustrated ambition. GREEN long has expressed his desire to be serving in the Senate at 100. Now he will not seek reelection this fall. On his last official day as a U.S. Senator, the Rhode Island Democrat will be only 93.

But GREEN'S four terms have already made him the oldest man ever to serve in the upper Chamber. Also, they have made him a living legend. In appearance the Senator resembles the late Roland Young in the role of Topper in the movies. In personal activities GREEN has been the talk of Washington, the spritely oldster addicted to 2-mile walks to the office, a patron of the cocktail party circuit and tennis player until 2 years ago. He refused, however, to take up golf because:

"It's an old man's game."

Politically, GREEN is one of the rich men who adopted the New Deal philosophy. Forty-eight years ago Theodore Roosevelt wanted him to manage the Bull Moose campaign, but GREEN stuck to his party. The GREEN skill at political infighting was apparent by then.

Twinkling blue eyes mirrored an enthusiasm for both the naked battle of the political arena and for legislative problems.

After this session, the familiar little figure will be gone from Capitol Hill. Even those who have disagreed with GREEN on matters of policy will miss their colleague. THEODORE GREEN'S zest for life made each day in the Senate—indeed, each day anywhere—a great new experience.

[From the Bristol (R.I.) Phoenix, Jan. 15, 1960]

SENATOR GREEN

U.S. Senator THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN has earned the right to retire from public life. He has been and still is an excellent example of the kind of man who should hold public office. From the standpoint of training, education, experience, and personal character, his qualifications are all that are to be desired in a man elected to represent others in government. And beyond all these he has that saving sense of wit and humor that have always made him a delight in public life.

In stating now that he will not run in the November elections, he once again displays the good judgment which has marked his career. His many friends, Democrats and Republicans alike, wish him years of good health so that he might continue to enjoy life without the cares and responsibilities that accompany public office.

AIR TRANSPORTATION OF ALL MAIL

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, I rise in opposition to S. 2402, which provides air transportation for mail that has not paid the airmail postage. This bill was reported by the Senate Post Office and Civil Service Committee to the Senate late in the session last year by a committee vote of five to four. Joining me in voting against the proposal was the distinguished chairman of the Senate Post Office and Civil Service Committee, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON] and such able members of our committee as the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. YARBOROUGH] and the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. JORDAN].

S. 2402 would, first, authorize the Postmaster General to transport all classes of mail, other than air mail and air parcel post, by air carrier if he finds it would be in the public interest, because of the nature of the terrain, or the impracticability or inadequacy of surface transportation, and when the cost thereof is reasonably compatible with the service to be provided; second, require air carriers to provide such transportation under rates and conditions prescribed by the CAB; and, third, authorize the Postmaster General and any air carrier to contract for such transportation at other than CAB prescribed rates.

The Postmaster General is now transporting some first-class mail by air on an experimental basis, but this bill would go far beyond that, and would, in addition, authorize air transportation for second, third, and fourth classes of mail regardless of the postage paid.

Mr. President, the bill does not limit the additional expense that will be incurred over and above that now being incurred in the movement of this mail by surface means. The provision that the cost of the air transportation must be reasonably compatible with the service to be provided is no limitation, since we must assume that the CAB will fix rates which are reasonably compatible with the service to be provided. Transportation rates by air have been suggested at an average of 19 cents per ton-mile, which is at least 3 times greater than the transportation rates by surface carriers, and even this rate has been objected to by the airlines as being too low.

S. 2402 MEANS HIGHER POSTAL RATES

It is inconceivable that the service sought under S. 2402 can be effectuated without greatly increasing the cost of operation of the Post Office Department, and these costs must be recovered either through increased postage rates or appropriations from the general funds.

I understand that the Postmaster General, following release of Senate Report No. 805, has taken steps to provide air transportation for classes of mail here under consideration between major cities of the United States, and has indicated that there will be a reduction in the railway post office service between the same points. When railway post office service is reduced or eliminated it not only affects the terminal cities, but it also has the effect of greatly impairing the service to the many smaller towns and villages lying along the routes of the RPO cars between the terminals.

S. 2402 MEANS POORER MAIL SERVICE TO MOST COMMUNITIES

The shift from surface transportation to air transportation between major cities could improve the service between those cities only and even then there is no assurance of an improvement since time in transit is not the only factor affecting the delivery of mail. Enroute distribution by railway post office cars or highway post offices can offset the greater speed by air, and at the same time provide an excellent service to the smaller cities. There are only about 800 air stops in this country, whereas the railroads, which carry the greater part of the mails, serve directly some 12,000 post offices.

Mr. President, since the proposal to fly all classes of mail is based on a "voluntary space-available basis," which means that the airlines will transport the mail if they wish to and have the space to accommodate it, there is no assurance that mail taken to airports will move promptly between points where the service is expected to be provided. There have been many instances where mail has been taken to airports and then, because of the inability of the airlines to move the mail promptly, has been returned to the post office for movement by surface transportation. The result could very well be complete chaos so far as a dependable regular service is concerned. In addition, it would be quite reasonable to assume that, with the disclosure of this service, there would be a tendency on the part of many citizens to cease using airmail postage and thus reduce the revenues of the Post Office Department. The citizens of this country are entitled to an airmail service unencumbered and unhindered by the transportation of surface mail by air. That the dual system, that is, an airmail and a first-class mail, is satisfactory is evidenced by the fact that millions of people use airmail at the higher cost when speed is of sufficient importance.

RAILWAY MAIL SERVICE FULLY ADEQUATE

The Postmaster General has always been able to obtain all of the transportation by surface means that he needs. The railroads have some of their finest service betwen the points where he has announced that he intends to fly the mail. In addition, the railroads have expressed a willingness to establish exclusive mail and express trains wherever the volume of business warrants such a service. Indeed, many such trains are now operated.

S. 2402 must be carefully reviewed and considered by the Congress since it inevitably means higher postage rates and poorer mail service to most communities in our Nation, as well as endangering the financial security of the railroad industry which is so vital to our national defense. It is my earnest hope that this legislation will not be enacted into law.

PASSENGER TRAINS IN OREGON WOULD SUFFER PARTICULARLY

Furthermore, Mr. President, I should like to point out one additional factor which has helped to persuade me to oppose this bill. Evidence submitted by the Post Office Department has indicated that the principal loss of railway post-office cars, should S. 2402 be enacted, would occur in the long-haul railroad operations. These are the long-distance rail routes, predominantly the transcontinental trains.

Such trains are the principal common-carrier surface transportation linking communities like Seattle, Portland, Tacoma, and Spokane with Middle Western and Eastern States. They also afford service for the smaller cities in my own State of Oregon like Pendleton, La Grande, Baker, Ontario and others. I am informed that the loss of railway post-office cars could jeopardize the continuance of these trains. Already, transcontinental train service between the Pacific Northwest and Chicago has suffered heavily from elimination of many once-popular passenger trains. Not very many more of these trains can be abandoned without the total loss of passenger train service between our State and the rest of the Nation.

These references may seem merely regional in character, Mr. President, but I fear that passage of S. 2402 would place in great danger the jobs of hundreds of railroad workers in my State, as well as reducing the transportation facilities available to Oregon and its neighbors. S. 2402, while containing some worthy features, would disrupt existing transportation facilities with possibly disastrous consequences.

Only recently, Mayor Robert F. Wagner, of New York City, speaking before the Exchange Club of Chicago, cited the transportation crisis in his community due to the abandonment of many passenger trains. He noted that subsidy of these trains might cost far less than the construction of many new super highways and off street parking facilities to take care of travelers forced off the rails and onto public thoroughfares.

The current January 18, 1960, issue of Time magazine likewise features an article on this general problem. The article points out that a double-track railroad can transport five times as many people per hour as a four-lane superhighway. Adds Time:

> To build enough highways for the 30,000 commuters who travel into Philadelphia on the Pennsylvania Railroad would cost $611 million. If everyone who now rides the trains into New York decided to drive, a third of Manhattan (Island) would be needed just for parking space.

In view of all these situations, Mr. President, I regard it as unwise for the Federal Government to adopt a post office policy which will merely accelerate and hasten the abandonment of so many passenger train facilities throughout America, at present so disturbing.

THE STEEL STRIKE SETTLEMENT

Mr. HARTKE. Mr. President, we are all pleased that we are not once more in the throes of a steel strike. But I believe the words of the distinguished columnist, Walter Lippmann, sum up the situation in the truest and best form.

The respected Mr. Lippmann wrote:

> So, we have come to a crude and embarrassing ending to an inglorious and mismanaged policy. * * * I think it is arguable from the record that a settlement on the Nixon-Mitchell terms could have been had at any time.

The settlement was clearly an act of political expediency.

Federal negotiators did not enter the dispute until after the strike was called, even though companies everywhere were stockpiling steel for the strike they knew would come. No one looked after the welfare of the people, something which cannot be stockpiled.

By mid-June of last year I think anyone who read the papers or listened to the radio or watched TV knew a steel strike was coming. But the official policy of the administration was "hands off."

A number of us in the Senate, Mr. President, met with representatives of both sides of the dispute to see what we could do to head off the impending strike. Those of us from steel-producing States begged the President to meet with us and Governors to see what could be done toward a settlement.

There was a refusal by the administration at every turn to demonstrate leadership—to try and help find a solution. The strike dragged on. Fact finders reported. The Secretary of Labor said he had a legislative solution, but he refused to tell us, who legislate, what it was—if anything.

The President declined to use the power and prestige of his Office in the national welfare.

Finally, the strike ended with the hand of leadership absent and the hand of politics present.

The cost of the strike to all concerned was fearful, at a time when our economy was sagging anyway with pockets of unemployment, contracting foreign markets, and increasing Soviet competition. Estimates are that the cost of the strike was $1.16 billion in wages and $5 billion in production.

In my State of Indiana we normally produce a fifth of the Nation's steel. We lost more than $200 million in wages and $1 billion in production. Our State government lost an estimated $1 million in tax revenue alone. Dollars lost cannot compare to the unnecessary human suffering the people of Indiana were compelled to undergo.

Only time will tell if the terms of the settlement were good for the country. Only time will tell us if prices of steel will rise—and then, if the time comes when they do, will it be after the election. Only time will tell us if the companies will settle for something less than record profits.

But we do not have to wait on time to tell us that we have already paid a heavy price. The price might have been far less had the administration acted with true leadership instead of neglecting the public welfare.

HELP FOR THE HELPLESS

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, last year I introduced a bill, S. 1403, which would authorize the extension of aid for dependent children to cover those children who are in need because of the unemployment of their parents. At present, as Members of this body know, a child is not eligible for Federal aid unless he is in need because of the death, desertion, or disability of his father. This results in the anomalous circumstance whereby fathers who cannot find work are frequently able to provide for their families only by deserting them and thus making them eligible for public assistance.

The Advisory Council on Public Assistance, which recently made its report to Secretary Flemming, has recommended that children who are in need for any reason be eligible for aid to dependent children. This goes further even than my bill.

In an editorial which appeared on January 7, 1960, the Washington Post has endorsed this recommendation of the Advisory Council. I ask unanimous consent that the editorial be printed at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HELP FOR THE HELPLESS

Some of the conditions attached to public assistance for dependent children, the aged, unemployed and others in desperate need seem designed to thwart the very aims for which the assistance is provided. The Advisory Council on Public Assistance, after a year of careful study, has recommended that these conditions be modified in important ways. Congressional action and State action alike will be required to put the desired changes into effect.

The two changes recommended by the Council which seem most significant were urged here not long ago by District Welfare Director Gerard M. Shea. Residence requirements for public assistance ought to be abandoned entirely; misery knows no geographical limitations. To bring about this change, the Council sensibly proposes that Federal grants be denied to States which impose a waiting period before granting assistance.

Similarly, there is obvious need to alter the prevailing present condition that Federal aid may be given to children only if they are deprived of support or care because of absence, death or incapacity of one parent. As the report of the Council remarks, "a hungry, ill-clothed child is as hungry or ill-clothed if he lives in an unbroken home" as an orphan or illegitimate child without a father. Besides, the present limitation pushes indigent fathers into deserting their families so they can qualify for relief.

In general, the Council proposes that the Social Security Act be amended to provide Federal aid to needy persons "regardless of the cause of need." Common sense as well as common humanity supports this view.

PRESIDENT EISENHOWER'S STATE OF THE UNION MESSAGE

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, one of the best commentaries on President Eisenhower's state of the Union message that I have seen is the one which appeared in the Harrisburg Patriot of January 9, 1960.

This newspaper supported President Eisenhower in both his election campaigns, but this support does not prevent its taking a balanced and objective view of the President's policies in its editorial page—which, incidentally, is one of the best editorial pages in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and, indeed, in the Nation.

While the Patriot praises many aspects of the state of the Union message, it is critical of the President's failure to "give persuasive answers to the widening missile gap between the United States and the U.S.S.R." and of his failure to mention Federal aid to depressed areas in the United States. The newspaper is also dissatisfied with his comments on inflation and by his lack of fire on the issue of civil rights.

I ask uanimous consent that the editorial be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE STATE OF THE WORLD—A LOOK BACK, A LOOK AHEAD

According to some Republicans, President Eisenhower's state of the Union message is one of the greatest documents of all time.

According to some Democrats, it is a compilation of sweet nothings.

One must suspect that it is neither. It is, on the whole, an outline of our position within and beyond our borders whose worth will become clearly discernible only in the light of the future.

Of necessity, the President concentrated on assessing America's posture and purpose against a worldwide backdrop.

He restated our desire to live in peace with all nations but reiterated that it must be a peace with freedom. In fact, he said, "in our scale of values we place freedom first."

Reassuringly, he made clear that America isn't going to be duped into lowering its guard by the Kremlin's recent pleasantries. In short, we would negotiate from strength.

The President was sanguine about our defenses as an adequate deterrent to Communist aggression. But he failed to give persuasive answers to the widening missile gap between the United States and the U.S.S.R. He promised to work toward improving our space program to the extent of doubling its funds. But there have been growing doubts whether money alone can bring us up to par in the absence of new ideas and a central, efficient setup to put them into practice. Certainly, this problem needs the closest scrutiny in the months to come.

Mr. Eisenhower had the good news that our next budget will probably show a $4.2 billion surplus. This surplus, he said, will be used to pay off part of the huge national debt. There can be no quarrel with this, provided the saving isn't achieved at the expense of vital projects, such as defense. Certainly it makes sense to try to reduce the Nation's debt during the Nation's greatest prosperity.

The President reiterated the close relationship between the economic progress of the underdeveloped nations and the security of the free world. And he gave a timely nudge to the well-to-do countries in Europe and the Far East to assume a greater burden.

Our gold reserves have been depleted to the danger point. Our foreign payment balance shows a $4 billion deficit. This trend can't go on without imperiling our economy and, consequently, the stability of the entire West.

Unfortunately, the President held out no hope for an assistance program much closer to home. He said nothing of Federal aid to depressed areas in which Pennsylvania in particular abounds. These are underdeveloped areas which Mr. Eisenhower apparently doesn't see. But they are there and won't go away just because they're ignored.

The President made an eloquent and urgent point when he characterized inflation as our prime domestic problem. "We must fight it," he said, "as we would fight a fire that imperils our home."

It is doubtful, however, whether the galloping prices and costs can be arrested merely by what Mr. Eisenhower termed "stern self-discipline by every citizen."

The steel strike is painful evidence that labor and management cannot be depended upon to place the Nation's interest ahead of their own because it's the patriotic thing to do. And the dilemma isn't going to be solved simply by appealing to the common sense of protagonists engaged in a fight for profits on one hand and bigger wages on the other.

Somehow, and soon, the inflation spiral must be blocked. And it well may take some laws to help patriotism along in this field.

One would wish, too, that the President had displayed more fire on the civil rights issue with its vast moral, social, economic, and international implications. We have a long way to go here before our performance begins to match our words.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COOPER in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

TRIBUTE BY THE EDITORS OF WISDOM MAGAZINE TO FORMER SENATOR WILLIAM BENTON, OF CONNECTICUT

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, the current issue of Wisdom magazine pays tribute to one of the most thoughtful men ever to serve in the U.S. Senate, William Benton, of the State of Connecticut.

This honor is attributable not only to Senator Benton's distinguished career in business and in public life, but also because of his position as publisher of the Encyclopaedia Britannica, which is one of the great compendiums of knowledge and facts available to mankind.

I am particularly pleased to call attention in the Senate to this tribute to ex-Senator Benton, because I regard William Benton as an American of genuine courage and valor. Ahead of his time, he warned of ominous forces of hysteria and intolerance which threatened our heritage of liberty and brotherhood. His lonely stand in this regard may have contributed to his defeat for reelection in 1952, but it may also be a factor in the almost universal respect and esteem in which William Benton is held today in our country and in the free world. Despite his retirement from public office, he is a citizen of influence and eminence. His words carry weight and profundity.

Political opportunism, alas, is a more prevalent commodity than political sacrifice and bravery. Relatively few Senators challenge majority opinions in their own States, much as they may risk unpopularity in another State where they do not run for office. As a Member of the Senate, William Benton defied what probably was prevailing sentiment in his home State of Connecticut. This may have cost him his Senate seat. Yet it also heightened his stature, and stature is a priceless ingredient in both public and private life. Thus I am happy today to cite the issue of Wisdom magazine which heralds the outstanding career of former Senator William Benton, of Connecticut. The tribute is a deserved one, as many will agree.

Mr. President, the leadership of William Benton in our Nation continues to demonstrate itself in many good works. Under his direction, the education subcommittee of the Democratic Party's advisory council has recently brought forth a most comprehensive and necessary proposed program to extend educational opportunities in this country. The keystone of the program is a plan for Federal aid to schools similar to the famed Murray-Metcalf bill, which could do much to equalize school facilities in our Nation and to make certain that our greatest resource—namely, the brains of young Americans—is not wasted and frittered away.

An excellent summary of the educational program prepared under ex-Senator William Benton's wise guidance was published in the Washington Post and Times Herald of January 18, 1960, under the byline of Mr. Raymond Lahr, of United Press International. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that the article be printed in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEMOCRATIC ADVISORY COUNCIL ASKS U.S. AID-TO-EDUCATION BILL

(By Raymond Lahr)

The Democratic Advisory Council proposed yesterday that the Federal Government undertake a program of aid for education starting at $1 billion a year and rising eventually to $3 or $4 billion.

It said many States and communities had done much in the past 10 years to expand and improve schools but that they must do more and that they are entitled to more help from the National Government.

The council said the Eisenhower administration "has been characteristically strong on words and weak on deeds" in promoting better education.

SERIES OF PAMPHLETS

The council, an arm of the Democratic National Committee, is composed of former President Truman, Adlai E. Stevenson and other party leaders, most of them from outside Congress. It gave its sizeup of "education and freedom's future" in a report, one of a series of pamphlets it is publishing on foreign and domestic problems.

"Even in a world at peace it would be priority business for our free society to help every young person develop his full potentialities through education," the council said.

"In a world threatened by the aggressive challenge of the Soviet Union, education becomes a means for national survival as well."

PROGRAM RECOMMENDED

It recommended this program:

Passage of an Education Act of 1960 to provide greater coordination of Federal education programs with machinery modeled after the 1946 Employment Act. That act created the President's Council of Economic Advisers and a joint House-Senate Economic Committee. An education council would help the President prepare a report, which would be reviewed by a joint congressional committee on education.

Congress should grant the limit on funds for the National Defense Education Act program of fellowships, loans and grants, and should review the authorized limit to see if it is high enough.

While leaving control of schools to State and local governments, the Federal Government should give financial aid to the States.

Federal grants—with States perhaps required to match Federal funds—would equal $25 for each school-age child the first year, $50 the second, $75 the third, and $100 the fourth and subsequent years. Additional help would be given the poorest States.

Set up a cooperative program with the Federal Government matching State funds to provide college scholarships, starting at $25,000 a year and increasing the number eventually to 100,000.

Scholarships would be adjusted to individual need but would not exceed $1,000 a year.

Expanding the college housing loan program to include all buildings and set up a new program of matching grants to improve and build facilities.

The pamphlet was originally drafted by an education subcommittee headed by former Senator William Benton of Connecticut. It was reviewed and revised by the council's economic policy committee and the council itself.

NARCOTICS USE AMONG JUVENILES

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, the Subcommittee To Investigate Juvenile Delinquency, of which I am chairman, has been studying the problem of narcotics use among juveniles for the past several months. During this investigation, we have been concerned with the source of supply for illicit narcotics and marijuana as well as the high rate of use among boys and girls.

Last fall, committee staff members made an intensive investigation of the illicit narcotics traffic along the United States-Mexican border. In November, public hearings were held in three California cities, including Los Angeles, San Diego, and San Francisco, where we heard much valuable testimony from experts in the field of narcotics control and enforcement.

This Friday, we will resume our study of the juvenile narcotics problem with hearings here in Washington.

Mr. President, several very excellent editorials have appeared in newspapers around the country relating to this problem. I ask unanimous consent that two of these from the Los Angeles (Calif.) Times—"Shouting in the Proper Ears," November 15, 1959, and "Dust on the 'Mexican Desk,'" November 19, 1959—be printed at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Los Angeles Times, Nov. 15, 1959]

SHOUTING IN THE PROPER EARS

The grim recital of facts concerning the illicit narcotics traffic from Mexico to southern California has been heard many times before. But it has never had a more important audience than the Senate subcommittee which held hearings in Los Angeles last week.

DIPLOMACY REQUIRED

Bureaucracy and diplomacy require that such facts, no matter how flagrant and well documented, be transmitted to Washington only by proper official procedures. No matter how loud we may shout, it must be into the proper ears.

The Times started the shouting this summer by assigning Gene Sherman to investigate the border dope problem and the evil and sorrow it brings. The resulting public awareness prompted the California congressional delegation to seek official action in Washington, which in turn caused the Senate subcommittee investigating juvenile delinquency to probe further into the local narcotics smuggling situation.

Senator HENNINGS, the subcommittee chairman, said at the end of the week that "while much of the testimony and evidence produced at this hearing has been known to various people previously, it must be pointed out that, as Members of Congress charged with the responsibility of engendering activities of the Federal Government, we have had to take into consideration all information so that we could build a record as a sound basis for action upon our return to Washington."

SHOCKING RECORD

The record that was built in the Los Angeles hearings was as clear and unmistakable as it was shocking. Expert witness after expert witness reaffirmed the two basic facts of the local dope situation: that marihuana and heroin are in abundant supply and are easily obtainable in southern California, and that by far the biggest source is from across the border of our good neighbor, Mexico.

Subcommittee members reached the inevitable conclusion that "the only realistic method of alleviating the dope smuggling problem is by cooperative agreement with the Mexican Government."

"Upon our return to Washington," said Senator HENNINGS, "we will contact the State Department and with their advice seek ways to solve this problem."

And there is little doubt that on their way to the State Department headquarters, the Senators will stop off at the Treasury Building to discuss the dangerous conflict of jurisdiction between U.S. Customs officials and Federal narcotics officers.

Testimony last week indicated that Federal narcotics officers are working to combat international dope traffic with one hand tied behind them because of the strange division of authority between the two agencies.

CUSTOMS FAILURE

George White, regional Federal narcotics agent on the west coast, testified that the practice of assigning Federal Bureau of Narcotics agents in European and Middle East countries had succeeded in controlling the flow of illicit drugs to the United States. However, by some bureaucratic quirk, Mexico and the Orient were assigned to the Customs Service, which obviously has been unable to stem the smuggling tide.

When the subcommittee asked White what control steps had been set up in Mexico, he replied:

"Nothing. And I am afraid that our Government is to blame."

The subcommittee is scheduled to hear a rebuttal from customs officials this week in San Diego but U.S. Attorney General Rogers has already been advised of the charges and the importance of working out a consolidated effort.

The pattern that emerges from the hearings is the usual one of frustration. The ineffectiveness of local control efforts was again shown to be reinforced by what amounts to level indifference toward this most vicious of all corrupting crimes.

There is a difference today, however. An end to the frustration may soon be in sight, for we have begun to shout into the proper ears.

[From the Los Angeles Times, Nov. 19, 1959]

DUST ON THE "MEXICAN DESK"

The U.S. Senate subcommittee investigating the frightening flow of illicit narcotics from Mexico traveled southward from Los Angeles this week for a closer look at the border situation.

FIXING THE BLAME

What they found was even more confirmation that the ultimate responsibility—and much of the blame—lies in Washington and Mexico City.

Testimony at the subcommittee hearings Monday and Tuesday in San Diego made previous criticism of Federal narcotics control efforts seem almost complimentary by comparison.

District Attorney Don Keller of San Diego County bitterly told the investigating Senators that complaints about border vice conditions receive a pigeonhole instead of a priority in Washington. Efforts to close the border to juveniles, for instance, were initiated by the San Diego grand jury in 1951 and then taken up by the State legislature, which each year since 1953 has formally requested action in Washington.

"I was informed," said Keller, "that the Mexican desk (of the State Department) had a handy way of pigeonholing this sort of complaint."

PROBE PROMISED

This led Senator THOMAS HENNINGS, JR., subcommittee chairman, to declare his determination "to find out about these things gathering dust. * * * We want to find out why matters like these are not considered properly."

"Maybe some of those people back there need a fire built under them," he said.

More fuel for the Senators' fire was provided by O. J. Hawkins, chief of the San Diego office of the State bureau of narcotics.

"The fault lies with the attitude of the State Department, as expressed in bulletins issued from time to time," Hawkins testified.

"The Department says repeatedly that Mexico does not create a narcotics problem and that she is making tremendous strides to control dope."

Such bureaucratic blindness also resulted in the Treasury Department's decision not to assign Federal narcotics agents to work inside Mexico, the subcommittee learned last week in Los Angeles.

INSTANCES OF FAILURE

District Attorney Keller enumerated two other instances in his own county: Abolition of the Federal Bureau of Narcotics office in San Diego and elimination of customs control.

Although the city is only 17 miles from the border all appeals to Washington to reopen the San Diego offices were unavailing, Keller said.

Other witnesses familiar with the shocking border situation reiterated the basic facts disclosed by law enforcement officials at the Los Angeles hearings and by Gene Sherman in the Times narcotics series last summer: Not only does the great majority of marihuana and heroin in southern California come from Mexico but the amount of smuggling is increasing.

This terrible traffic will not be halted until the dust is swept off bureaucratic and diplomatic desks. The Times pledges that it will not rest until that dust—and with it the border dope traffic—is swept away.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

UNEMPLOYMENT IN THE MOHAWK VALLEY

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, last week, I spoke briefly on the floor of the Senate to report on the Schenectady, N.Y., hearings of the Senate Select Committee on Unemployment Problems. At that time I inserted in the RECORD a summary of the fine work being done by the GUTS (Gear Up For Tomorrow in Schenectady) program.

Mr. President, today I call attention to two statements, made at the hearings, which relate further to economic conditions in the Mohawk Valley region of my State. The first is by Mr. William Pollock, general president of the Textile Workers of America. The second is by Mr. Fred Krokenberger, business manager of the Amsterdam Joint Board, of the same union. Both of these statements are excellent presentations of the views of the leaders of the Textile Workers Union, and they add greatly to our knowledge of employment and economic conditions in the Mohawk Valley area.

At their request, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the statements of these leaders of the Textile Workers Union be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the addresses were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENTS BY WILLIAM POLLOCK, GENERAL PRESIDENT, TEXTILE WORKERS UNION OF AMERICA, AFL–CIO, BEFORE THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON UNEMPLOYMENT PROBLEMS, JANUARY 8, 1960

The time and place of this hearing add poignancy to the subject of the committee's investigations. The problem of unemployment is one which demands serious attention whenever and wherever it may be raised. But in January 1960 it is particularly fitting that we stop and take stock of our position in the age-old struggle against the human suffering that results from unemployment. We are entering a new decade. Will it be a new era? Can we fashion the tools for achieving a state of human progress in which the hopelessness of people who cannot find work will finally be abolished? This is the challenge of the sixties.

I believe we can meet this challenge. The means are at hand. It remains for us to grasp and to use them. I am confident that the investigation of this committee will reveal the shortcomings in our present approaches and uncover the tremendous potentialities of a systematic, integrated program for utilizing our human and physical resources to rid our society of joblessness and poverty. We can no longer afford the waste involved in mass unemployment and idle capital. The economics of the Soviet and Chinese Communist empire are growing too fast to permit us to accept the unemployment of 4 million Americans with complacency. By putting them to work, we can outdistance the Iron Curtain countries, increase our ability to aid the free world, and improve our own national self-confidence.

The city of Schenectady is an especially appropriate focal point for the study of unemployment problems. Here is an old center of heavy manufacturing industry which is suffering from the effects of industry's moves to newer areas. Neighboring towns in the Mohawk Valley are experiencing similar dislocations. Amsterdam, a major center of carpet and rug production, has lost one of its two large carpet mills and employs less than half the number of carpet workers employed 10 years ago. Gloversville, once the major supplier of the Nation's leather gloves, has been depressed by a decline in demand and the influx of imports which has captured the bulk of the domestic market for fine gloves.

How do we cope with the human problems created by the changes flowing from our dynamic economy? This is a question this Nation has been asking ever since the industrial revolution transformed the United States from an agricultural economy to an industrial power. In the 19th century a start was made in providing an answer. Limits were placed on the extent to which private industrial actions were permitted to cause public injury. State laws were adopted regulating factory conditions relating to the health and safety of workers. But it was not until the 1930's that the Federal Government recognized the national character of the human problems engendered by our industrial processes.

The social security and labor legislation developed in the great depression was a creative response to the need for bolstering the efforts of the individual in coping with the vicissitudes of life in a modern industrial society. The Federal programs that resulted from the innovations of the thirties provided a measure of security against the hazards of unemployment and old age. A floor was placed under wages to prevent extreme exploitation and the right to organize was established by law to enable workers to improve their economic and industrial position through collective bargaining.

These measures provided the underpinning for an economy that had lost its moorings. They sought to ameliorate the ill effects of a system that had gone wrong. But they did not seek to correct the operations of the system itself. It remained for the experience of the Second World War to teach us that the Federal Government has a significant positive role to play in promoting the full employment of our resources. The result was the Employment Act of 1946, which declared it the national policy for the Federal Government to "use all practical means * * * to coordinate and utilize all its plans, functions, and resources for the purpose of creating and maintaining * * * conditions under which there will be afforded useful employment opportunities * * * for those able, willing, and seeking to work, and to promote maximum employment, production, and purchasing power."

THE PROMISE OF THE EMPLOYMENT ACT OF 1946

The enactment of the Employment Act of 1946 marked a milestone in the development of a positive approach to the solution of the human and economic problems created by our industrial civilization. A new dimension was added to the function of the Federal Government in the economic sphere. A pledge was given to the American people that the National Government would do what was needed to achieve and maintain a full employment economy.

Has this pledge been kept? Have all Americans been afforded useful employment opportunities? Have maximum employment, production and purchasing power been achieved? To ask these questions is to answer them. With full-time unemployment averaging 3¼ million during the past 7 years, the Nation has lost $175–$200 billion in production owing to underemployment of our labor force. Surely the average rate of full-time unemployment during this period (4.8 percent) has been greatly in excess of what can be considered frictional. Even in the period from 1955 through 1957, when full-time unemployment averaged 4.3 percent, the Bureau of Labor Statistics found that only half of the unemployment was accounted for by short-term frictional factors (entry of new workers into the labor force; voluntary job shifting; and seasonal fluctuations). ("The Extent and Nature of Frictional Unemployment," Study Paper No. 6, prepared for the Joint Economic Committee of the Congress.)

The truth is that the Employment Act has not yet been adequately implemented. While the administration has given lip service to its principles, its actions have been directly contrary to the purposes of the act. Full employment has been subordinated to the balanced budget. An obsessive fear of inflation has displaced economic growth as our primary goal. The administration's tight money policy has cramped our recovery from the 1957–58 recession, leaving 4 million Americans out of work a year and a half after the start of the recovery. It has failed to adopt the correct policies to prevent rising prices and followed programs which have throttled the economy.

A major part of the problem of persistent unemployment—surely one of its most urgent aspects—is that of structural unemployment. The displacement of workers from their jobs as a result of changes in basic economic conditions attending economic growth is particularly serious because it is most likely to lead to long-term unemployment. The overall dimensions of this problem are indicated by the fact that in November 1959 some 823,000 of the 3.7 million unemployed in the United States were located in 171 labor market areas which were suffering from chronic economic distress. In comparison to a national rate of unemployment of 5.3 percent, the rate in the distressed areas was 8.8 percent.

STRUCTURAL UNEMPLOYMENT IN SCHENECTADY

Structural unemployment is at the heart of the problems facing the people of Schenectady and the entire Mohawk Valley. It is the type of unemployment about which the individual workers can do least. His main alternatives are to move or to await the appearance of new enterprise which would employ his skills. The major challenge therefore is to understand the nature of the developments which have made for the chronic condition of unemployment and for the Federal Government to provide the help necessary to inaugurate a new era of economic growth in these areas. In all of these instances, the communities have tried but, with the resources at their command, have been unable to overcome the decline in economic activity.

The central community in this area is Schenectady. Not only is it important because it is the largest but also because it has been the source of employment for people living in the city proper and also for people in the surrounding areas, including Amsterdam and Fulton County. As the distress developed in the latter two communities, men sought employment in the Schenectady shops. When the latter shrank their job opportunities and laid off the newly hired people, the residents of these outlying areas were first displaced as they were likely to have the least seniority. This aggravated the already difficult employment problems of these smaller communities.

The central issue in Schenectady is the determined and conscious policy of decentralization of operations pursued by the General Electric Co. It is deliberately moving out of Schenectady many of its important units and retaining only a few basic operations. This program has left a great economic void. Alco Products, Inc., which has been the second largest source of employment, has contracted its diesel manufacturing activities in this area and closed down its tank manufacturing facilities. As a result its employment has been cut to well below one-fourth its former peak. The contraction of both of these large centers of employment has also meant the loss of many auxiliary and feeder industries. The men and women employed in these industries, both on manual and nonmanual jobs, include people with the widest range of skills used in the modern metal manufacturing industry and constitute a reservoir of unsurpassable quality, highly necessary in this era of electronics and complex machine manufacture. Despite this invaluable resource, the community has not displayed the resilience necessary for adjustment to its economic setbacks. For the greater part of the last 2 years, its rate of unemployment was in excess of 6 percent and its current improved record is attributable in part to the fact that the displaced workers living in the surrounding communities are excluded from the count of the unemployed within the Schenectady area itself.

The citizens' program for diversification in the Schenectady area is interesting but the great question is whether it is adequate to the task of modernizing this community and making it better able to attract new industries. Has its long history of adjustment to the policies and needs of the General Electric Co. and Alco Products, Inc., handicapped this community in its ability to provide a home for other industries and companies? It is paradoxical that the hometown of the General Electric Co. should be suffering from its current difficulties in view of the company's proclaimed program of fostering a favorable industrial climate as a prerequisite for local economic growth.

With its impressive human and capital resources, this community should be the cradle for many new modern industries, but there is need to modernize the civic facilities and utilities to make it better able to absorb these enterprises. Through study these needs can be more quickly identified, corrections instituted, and the process of adjustment shortened. This is the crying need of the community of Schenectady upon which the future of much of the Mohawk Valley is dependent. It can fit into the pattern of American economic growth. What is necessary is to shorten this process deliberately so that human suffering and economic waste be reduced to a minimum.

The community cannot do this job itself. When it is left to its own resources, it will turn primarily if not exclusively upon promotional techniques which, however useful, will not be sufficient. Economic planning and modernization of the community's facilities to fit the needs of the newer industries must be pushed concurrently with the promotional work. These two developments will be inaugurated if the Federal Government helps underwrite these activities.

The two neighboring areas in the Mohawk Valley are confronted with different structural problems. Amsterdam is beset by the fact that it has depended upon the carpet industry for its basic economic foundation. Unfortunately, more than 5,000 carpet millworkers have lost their jobs in recent years as a result of a combination of factors, including the geographical relocation of the industry to the south, shifts in consumers' tastes, a rising volume of imports and technological changes. The Bigelow-Sanford Carpet Co., one of the two major operations in the city, has closed down all of its local activities and the Mohasco Co. has contracted considerably. These industries had for decades been the base of the economic organization of this community and its surrounding areas. They employed both men and women at comparatively high wage and benefits. This community had shaped its existence around the economies of these companies. The direct skills which they fostered were primarily useful to this industry.

The removal of these jobs has left thousands of men and women without other resources. There have been few alternative jobs available. Even though the community has made heroic efforts through Industries for Amsterdam, Inc., to find occupants for the abandoned carpet factory buildings and has itself constructed one new building, these additions have not been sufficient to correct the downward trend. Since the beginning of 1955, Amsterdam has been uninterruptedly classified as a surplus labor market.

The problems of redevelopment of this community are more difficult than those faced by Schenectady. There are obvious problems of physical rehabilitation in the community including the leveling of some of the older industrial sites along the railroads and the clearance of other outmoded facilities in order to open up sites for the construction of new buildings with better access to transportation and other utilities. Many necessary local public facilities must be advanced in order to make the community more attractive. These programs should be preceded by a careful economic analysis which will help to define precisely the way in which this community will fit into the major new American industrial and economic trends. Following such studies and projections, the human and physical resources must be updated and adapted to these trends. The crying need is to shorten the process of adjustment to our changing industrial complex. This community has done much to help itself but it is not sufficient to ameliorate the plight of the people or to provide the base for economic rehabilitation. It needs the help of the Federal Government to address itself vigorously and determinedly to this problem.

The third area, Gloversville-Johnstown, should be more properly labeled Fulton County. The distinctive feature of this area has been the preponderance of leather, fabric, and knit glove manufacture. The region has been dependent upon these industries for its growth. More particularly these communities have specialized in the manufacture of fine gloves. They have been beset by the fact that there has been a drop in the total consumption of women's leather gloves and a growing proportion of this domestic market has been taken up by imports. While cut and sewn fabric gloves made of warp knit fabric have gained in popularity, this industry has been a marginal operation in this area, with less than 5 percent of domestic production being located here. This branch has also suffered from low-cost competition from Puerto Rico, the Philippines, and other foreign producers. Seamless knit gloves have not fared better as foreign competition has also hit this branch. Moreover, the cutbacks in employment in Schenectady and Amsterdam adversely affected workers living in Fulton County for they were among the earliest to be laid off. As a result, the chronic unemployment has been of longer standing in this community than in the other areas of the Mohawk Valley. The problems of economic redevelopment are therefore of more serious nature. The experience of this area points up the discouragement which sets in after continuing high unemployment has become truly chronic.

The continuing depression has narrowed the tax base and has also resulted in a restruction of local services, both of which have inhibited new industries from coming into the area. The long standing economic difficulties have engendered a fatalism which has robbed the community of the daring and enterprise necessary to redevelop for new growth. A conservatism has set in which has deterred new growth. The funds have not been available locally for developing the base for new industries or economic activities. Here is a community which needs stimulation from a friendly Federal agency which will help it better to understand its problems and to define long term solutions. It cannot on its own find the answers to its difficulties; it must be helped to define its future pattern and the course to follow for its redevelopment. (For a thorough analysis of the Fulton County problem, see Betti Goldwasser, "Report on the Gloversville Project, Local Impact of Foreign Trade Project," National Planning Association, Washington, D.C., May 1957, mimeographed.)

HEAVY IMPACT ON TEXTILE WORKERS

Textile workers have borne a heavy share of the burden of structural unemployment in these areas. From a total of 15,600 in 1951, textile employment has fallen to 8,600, a decrease of 45 percent. The largest portion of this decline is accounted for by the demise of the carpet and rug industry in Amsterdam, where total textile employment dropped from 8,600 to 4,200 or 51 percent. The Albany-Schenectady-Troy area contributed a loss of 2,200 jobs in this period as textile employment declined from 5,500 to 3,300, a 40-percent reduction. In Gloversville textile employment fell from 1,500 to 1,100 in the past 8 years, a reduction of 27 percent.

The figures cannot tell the full story of the personal tragedies involved: the desperation of workers who see the mill shut down after a lifetime of service, without so much as a severance payment; the search for jobs where there are no jobs; the exhaustion of unemployment benefits; the exhaustion of personal savings; the dependence on private and public charity; and above all, the sense of hopelessness that overcomes the individual after many months of enforced idleness.

The plight of these people cries out for a solution. The promise of the Employment Act must be fulfilled. It is time to put into practice the words of the law: those who are "able, willing and seeking to work" must be afforded "useful employment opportunities." It will take imagination and the courage to innovate. But it must be done.

The Senate has taken the first step. The adoption of the Area Redevelopment Act by the Senate in the 1st session of the 86th Congress points the way to a massive attack on the problem of structural unemployment. This legislation would set in motion a coordinated program for redeveloping the distressed industrial and rural areas of this country so that they could throw off the yoke of hopelessness imposed by chronic unemployment. With technical assistance from the Federal Government, these communities could take a fresh look at themselves. They could determine what they have to offer and what it will take to put the area on its feet again. They could plan to take advantage of their resources—potential as well as actual. They could renew their public facilities. These are the essential prerequisites for an effective rehabilitation program.

Now it is up to the House of Representatives. The Committee on Banking and Currency has approved the bill. It remains for the House to act on it. Surely this should be the first order of business in the new session of Congress. The suffering of the people in economically distressed areas will brook no further delay. It is time we put the principles of the point 4 program to work at home. Can we hope to show the peoples of the underdeveloped areas in the world how to eradicate poverty if we cannot wipe out the pockets of economic distress in our own country?

AREA REDEVELOPMENT ACT A NEW MILESTONE

The Area Redevelopment Act will be a new milestone in the forward march of America. It will translate into concrete accomplishments the promise of full employment offered by the Employment Act of 1946. It will provide living proof for all the world to see that a free society can harness the resources of an economy for the benefit of all the people.

As we plan for the achievement of this great goal we must not neglect the immediate needs of the people in distressed areas. Emergency measures are needed to tide these people over until community rehabilitation is achieved. Government contracts should be channeled into these areas to provide immediate employment opportunities. Surplus food should be allocated. Persons in distressed communities who exhaust their unemployment benefits should receive extended benefits. The entire unemployment compensation system needs to be modernized, with Federal standards to assure adequacy of benefits and duration.

The free world looks to us for leadership in this critical time. As we enter the decade of the sixties unemployment is no longer merely a domestic problem. Our response to it may well prove crucial in determining the struggle between Communist tyranny and the free peoples of the world. Our success in solving the problem of unemployment will add strength to our purpose and set an example for all the world to emulate.

STATEMENT BY FRED KROKENBERGER, BUSINESS MANAGER, AMSTERDAM JOINT BOARD, TEXTILE WORKERS UNION OF AMERICA, AFL–CIO, ON THE NEED FOR ECONOMIC REDEVELOPMENT IN AMSTERDAM, N.Y., BEFORE THE SUBCOMMITTEE ON PROBLEMS OF UNEMPLOYMENT OF THE U.S. SENATE

The city of Amsterdam, N.Y., is economically distressed. It has been suffering from heavy unemployment continuously for the past 6 years. One of the largest plants in the area was closed in 1955 and further curtailments have since taken place. In spite of strenuous local efforts to attract new industries, employment has continued to decline. Unemployment in the latest available month (July) numbered 1,900, comprising 8.1 percent of the civilian labor force. The people of this distressed community look to the Federal Government for aid in redeveloping the area so that it can once again be placed on a healthy self-sustaining basis.

EVIDENCE OF DISTRESS

Employment in the Amsterdam area has fallen steadily in recent years. In 1951, nonagricultural industries covered by the unemployment insurance law employed 17,182 workers. Of this total, 13,167 were employed in manufacturing industries. By far the largest group (8,649) was employed in the textile industry, with the bulk of these workers accounted for by two large wool carpet and rug plants, Bigelow-Sanford Carpet Co., Inc., and Mohawk Carpet Co. Employment in these plants declined gradually until 1955, reflecting the drop in consumer demand for wool carpets and rugs and the substitution of tufted carpeting for woven carpets.

CARPET MILL LIQUIDATIONS

In the spring of 1955, the community suffered a severe blow when the Bigelow-Sanford Carpet Co. announced the liquidation of its Amsterdam plant, except for a small axminster carpet weaving unit. More than 2,000 workers were displaced, comprising about 20 percent of the total factory employment in the area. By the end of 1955 textile employment was down to 5,847, a decline of 32 percent from the 1951 average. Total covered employment declined from 17,182 to 14,262, or 17 percent, during this period.

While there was a modest pickup in employment in 1956 and 1957, the latter year witnessed new reverses in the community's fortunes as Bigelow-Sanford closed its remaining axminster weaving unit, displacing 400 workers, and the Mohawk company also shut down its axminster weaving unit, resulting in the loss of 700 additional jobs. Mohawk had merged with Alexander Smith, Inc., at the end of 1955, becoming Mohasco Industries, Inc., and making it possible to shift its axminster production to the Greenville, Miss., plant which the city of Greenville had built for Alexander Smith. The subsidy which Greenville had supplied (amounting to $4,750,000) thus was instrumental in wiping out 700 jobs in Amsterdam.

Further declines in textile employment brought total employment to a low of 13,458 for the year 1958, with textiles accounting for 3,825 jobs. In spite of the improvement in 1959, employment in covered industries during the latest available period (first quarter) was only 13,640, still lower than in any comparable period during the past decade, except for the recession low of 1958. Textile employment (4,181) had dropped by 4,468 since 1951. Less than one-quarter of this loss had been offset by gains in apparel (which increased from 1,548 in 1951 to 2,045 in 1959), food (which rose from 1,507 to 1,710) and durable goods plants (which increased from 218 to 607). Consequently, there was a net loss of 3,542 jobs in covered employment from 1951 to the first quarter of 1959. The area's largest employer (the Mohawk carpet mill) currently employs 2,500 compared to the previous peak of 5,400.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND ITS CONSEQUENCES

The impact of the decline of the textile industry on the economy of Amsterdam is evident in the physical structure of the community and the suffering of its people. High rates of unemployment have become chronic, persisting in prosperous periods and reaching catastrophic proportions during general recessions. Thus in 1954, when the national average rate of unemployment rose to 5.6 percent, the Amsterdam rate fluctuated between 11.6 and 17 percent. In the 1955–57 recovery, when the national average varied between 4.2 and 4.4 percent, the annual average for Amsterdam stayed up between 8.9 and 9.8 percent more than twice as high as the national rates. The 1958 recession raised the national average to 6.8 percent while the Amsterdam unemployment ratio jumped to 14.1 percent, with a high of 18 percent in July. By July of 1959, the national unemployment rate had fallen to 5.2 percent while 8.1 percent of Amsterdam's labor force was still unemployed.

As high as the Amsterdam figures are, they are still an understatement of the seriousness of the unemployment problem in this area. Thousands of workers who have sought employment unsuccessfully for long periods have either left the labor force entirely or have departed to look for work elsewhere. In July 1957, there were 26,850 persons in the Amsterdam labor force (employed and unemployed). By July 1959 this number had dwindled to 23,450, a decline of 3,400 in 2 years. This marked decrease indicates that many residents of the Amsterdam area have withdrawn from the labor force out of despair. While the Government estimates of unemployment do not include these people, they are an integral part of the problem faced by the community.

RISING WELFARE COSTS

The high cost of meeting the immediate consequences of this problem is evident from the figures on welfare expenditures in the area. The cost of home relief has mounted steadily. In 1951, when the average number of persons receiving home relief was 197, the cost amounted to $62,000. In 1958, the average number of recipients had jumped to 350 and the cost to $106,000. In the first 11 months of 1959 the average number of recipients rose to 368 and the cost ($119,000) exceeded the amount for the entire year 1958. Expenditures for home relief in the first 11 months of 1959 were 26 percent greater than in the corresponding period last year and 111 percent greater than in the corresponding period in 1951.

These steep increases in relief costs result from the inadequacy of the current unemployment insurance system in dealing with the problems of chronic unemployment. While payments under the unemployment compensation programs have cushioned the economic distress of those affected by short-term unemployment, they do not meet the needs of the people in an area suffering from persistent distress. Payments under the permanent State and Federal programs in the Amsterdam area amounted to $1,255,000 in 1951 and rose to $2,541,000 in 1954. After falling to $1,591,000 in 1957, unemployment compensation benefits jumped to $2,706,000 in 1958. In addition, payments under the Federal Temporary Unemployment Compensation Act of 1958, effective June 23d, amounted to $419,000 in 1958. Regular benefits in the first 9 months of 1959 amounted to $1,269,000, with an additional $168,000 paid under the Federal and State temporary programs, which expired in July.

EXHAUSTION OF UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION

The inadequacy of present unemployment insurance provisions is highlighted by the fact that 1,442 claimants exhausted their benefits in 1958; these workers comprised 66 percent of the average number of claimants during the year. As a result of the high rate of benefit exhaustions, the proportion of all unemployed workers who received compensation fell from 70 percent in January 1958 to 61 percent in November 1958 and to a low of 52 percent in June 1959.

Older workers have been hit particularly hard by the distressed condition of the Amsterdam economy. These workers have much more difficulty in finding a new job when they are laid off than do younger workers. In January 1959, when unemployment insurance claimants in Amsterdam numbered 1,859, the proportion of claimants who were 65 or over was 9.4 percent. In October, when the total number of claimants had declined to 836, the proportion 65 and over jumped to 19.6 percent. Significant increases in the proportions in the 55–64 and 45–54 age groups also took place during this period, with the former rising from 15.7 to 16.7 percent and the latter from 24 to 29.3 percent.

DECLINE IN POPULATION

The lack of adequate employment opportunities has resulted in a gradual decline in the population of Amsterdam. From 33,329 in 1940, the population fell to 32,240 in 1950, a decline of 3 percent in a decade which saw an increase of 10 percent in the population of the State. In 1959 the population of Amsterdam is estimated at 31,745, a further decline of 2 percent since 1950, compared to an increase of 13 percent for New York State.

The demise of the textile industry in Amsterdam has left the city with considerable excess factory space. Approximately half a million square feet of vacant space still exists in the old buildings vacated by Bigelow-Sanford in 1955. An additional 100,000 square feet of space is vacant in other industrial buildings, much of which is obsolete. In addition, many thousands of square feet of space is to be found in vacant stores and other commercial structures.

LOCAL EFFORTS AT REHABILITATION

The efforts of the people of Amsterdam to solve the problems resulting from the decline in the textile industry have been organized by Industries for Amsterdam, a membership corporation established in 1954. This group is designed to promote the location of new industrial enterprises in the city. It collected $260,000 in contributions and built a factory shell which is currently occupied by the Ward Products Co., a manufacturer of antenna employing 125 workers. It has also obtained credit of $80,000 for the acquisition and development of real estate suitable for industrial development. The only plant which has availed itself of this opportunity so far is the Southwest Manufacturing Co., a boat building firm employing 60 workers. In addition to these activities, Industries for Amsterdam has sought to attract new industries by disseminating information. Altogether, as a result of its efforts to date the development corporation claims the location of 15 new industrial plants in the area, including the two above-mentioned plants, with a total employment of between 1,000 and 1,150.

Another organization which has been active in the industrial promotion field has been L. Grossman Sons Inc., which acquired the former Bigelow-Sanford real estate in December 1955. This firm has leased or sold space in the old carpet plant to 13 firms, which currently employ a total of approximately 900 employees. Five of these firms, employing 800 workers, received assistance from "Industries for Amsterdam," and are included in the above-cited figures for the development corporation. The peak employment by Bigelow-Sanford in these buildings had been in excess of 3,200. All but 4 of the current tenants employ fewer than 40 workers apiece, and 7 of them have fewer than 20 employees. Only 1 employs more than 200. Approximately one-fourth of the 2 million square feet of floor space in these buildings is still vacant.

It is clear from the gap which still exists between the community's needs and the achievements of local promotion groups over the past 6 years that Federal assistance is urgently needed. Local resources are inadequate to the tremendous task of revitalizing the area. It will take more than the erection of a few factory shells and the sale or leasing of existing plants to very small businesses to solve Amsterdam's basic problems. What is needed is a fundamental study of the community's economic, physical, and human resources and a plan which would take advantage of the area's actual and potential advantages. With appropriate planning and adequate financing, the Amsterdam area can be redeveloped into a highly attractive location for modern, progressive industries.

CONTRIBUTIONS OF A FEDERAL REDEVELOPMENT PROGRAM

Only the Federal Government is in a position to provide the integrated program necessary to revitalize the Amsterdam area. We heartily endorse the Douglas area redevelopment bill (S. 722) as encompassing the flexible and comprehensive approach which is imperative for the solution of our problems.

First, it would provide technical assistance to our local development group in conducting a survey of the current and potential resources of the community. This information is indispensable to the intelligent planning of a constructive development program. It will point to the kinds of industries we should seek to attract to our community. Moreover, it will enable our development group to discuss local advantages with prospective employers on a specific and factual basis.

Second, the bill would integrate the redevelopment program with the existing Federal urban renewal program. At present, the latter is largely confined to residential renewal. Extension of the urban renewal program to areas which are not primarily residential will make available Federal grants to defray a portion of the cost of removing obsolete industrial and commercial structures as part of the economic development of the area. This would be an important contribution to the improvement of Amsterdam's layout, making it possible to build modern plants in locations which are convenient for transportation facilities.

Third, the Douglas bill would authorize the Secretary of Labor to determine the needs of our community for vocational training to meet the new skills required by new and expanding industries in the area. In order to enable unemployed persons to get the benefits of this training the bill also provides for subsistence payments to such persons while they are being trained.

Finally, the area redevelopment bill would provide financial assistance for projects which would fit in with the overall program for redevelopment, as drawn up by the local development group. Such assistance would contribute to the revitalization of the community through the improvement of public facilities and the construction of industrial and commercial facilities necessary for balanced economic growth.

NEED FOR IMPROVEMENT IN UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION

The experience of the people of Amsterdam is clear proof that present unemployment compensation provision are inadequate. We endorse the Karsten-Machrowicz-Kennedy-McCarthy bill, which would establish Federal standards guaranteeing each eligible worker unemployment benefits for up to 39 weeks, and increasing the benefits to the levels originally intended for unemployment compensation.

With decent Federal standards for unemployment insurance and a Federal program for area redevelopment, we are confident that the people of Amsterdam can overcome the difficulties that have made our community a distressed area during the past 6 years. We shall rebuild our economy on a sounder base to assure a healthy future for ourselves and our children.

WASHINGTON POST SUPPORTS REMOVAL OF INTEREST-RATE CEILING

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, on Thursday of last week, when I spoke briefly on the floor, I stated my position in favor of the President's request for the removal of the interest-rate ceiling on long-term Government bonds.

As I said at that time, I intend to follow up on this matter; and it is my hope that in the near future it will be possible to bring about congressional action to carry out the President's request.

Mr. President, today I want to call attention to an excellent editorial, published in the Washington Post, supporting the removal of the interest-rate ceiling. The Post is squarely in favor of immediate congressional action to remove this unrealistic and arbitrary limit. The Post's analysis of and comment on this matter deserve careful consideration.

Mr. President, I commend the Post for its fine editorial, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Jan. 18, 1960]

MIXED OBJECTIVES

The argument about the efficacy of the Federal Reserve Board's monetary controls and the wisdom with which they have been used in the past will no doubt continue for a long time. There is much room for improvement both in techniques and in timing. Most of all, monetary policy should be fitted to a larger framework in which the long-term requirements of growth would more fully influence day-by-day decisions. But, given the present state of affairs, the President's renewed request for elimination of the archaic ceiling on the interest rates of Government bonds is supported by the most urgent considerations. Congressional attempts to evade this present need in a search for monetary-policy reforms are an unrealistic mixing of objectives.

If Congress wishes to attempt to define a monetary policy for the avoidance of high interest rates, let it recognize that the task involves a quite sweeping reappraisal of budget, tax, and credit programs and then lift its sights to the challenge. But, in the meantime, it cannot ignore the consequences of past failure to develop institutions and policies within which severely restrictive monetary controls and high interest rates might not be necessary.

The unavoidable fact is that the short-term money market is exceedingly tight and the Government's necessary reliance on short-term borrowing has contributed to the trouble, although it is by no means the only cause. Unless the Treasury is freed to enter the long-term market at realistic interest rates, short-term rates may be driven even higher.

Let Congress acknowledge these facts in sorrow, if it wishes, but let them be faced. Then the larger task of freeing up the country's full productive potential can be undertaken. If this broader goal could be achieved, the Government's debt-management problems would be eased in more fundamental and lasting ways.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CARLSON in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CONGRESS, AS WELL AS THE PRESS, SHOULD BE GIVEN COPIES OF THE PRESIDENT'S PROPOSED BUDGET

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, in behalf of all Americans, I desire to enter a strong protest against the one-sided, and thereby deliberately distorted, manner in which the Bureau of the Budget and the current administration is using Madison Avenue propaganda techniques to try to foist off the proposed budget on the American people.

Since last Saturday, gentlemen of the press have been calling my office to get me to comment on this or that item in the President's budget. Copies of the budget were handed the press last Saturday, yet they were marked for release today at noon, and copies were expected to be delivered at my office and the offices of most other Senators around 1 p.m. today.

Mr. President, I do not object to this information being given to the press, because I am a firm believer in keeping the press informed so that it in turn can contribute mightily to keeping the people informed. But I do object most strenuously to the press being informed before Members of the Congress as to proposed expenditures, for I believe that we who are elected to represent the people and vote the money and the taxes to run this Government have an even greater responsibility than any private business in letting the people know about proposed projects and expenditures. In line with this responsibilty, it seems to me just as important that we of the Senate, and even key members of our staffs, should receive information on proposed budgetary actions, as it is for private individuals to have such information.

Mr. President, I think it is time for the executive branch of the Government to treat the legislative branch as equal partners in the Government, and stop treating the Congress as a bunch of schoolboys to whom information is doled out at the will of the teacher.

Mr. President, I desire to address myself to another subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas has the floor.

WILL OF MRS. W. L. CLAYTON, GREAT DEMOCRATIC WOMAN LEADER, INCLUDES LARGE BEQUEST FOR HER "BELOVED COUNTRY" THE UNITED STATES

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, on Monday January 11, it was my painful duty to bring to the attention of the Senate the fact that one of our most honored and distinguished philanthropists and Democratic leaders of Texas, Mrs. W. L. Clayton, had passed away.

As the wife of Will Clayton, brilliant former Under Secretary of State, Mrs. Clayton would have naturally enjoyed wide social acceptance and prominence. Therefore, I think it particularly adds to her enduring fame and credit that on her own she did such outstanding work, made such exceptional contributions of service and money to helping thousands who could not help themselves, and that she earned widespread personal recognition.

Perhaps one of her most remarkable attributes was that although she was blessed with substantial wealth, she assiduously avoided joining with the so-frequent cry of the money class against taxes, against spending on programs of human decency. On the contrary, as an ardent supporter of President Franklin Roosevelt, she worked many hours to forward his basic programs of economic justice—his fights to "return America to the American people." She believed in liberty and equality and individual dignity, and she recognized that our Nation virtually was the only spot on earth where all men have even a chance of enjoying such priceless treasures.

This was not only true at the national level, but also at the local level, as evidenced by the fact that she fought for slum clearance in her home city of Houston.

It was, I think, entirely fitting, then, that she should not forget her country in her last will, although probably no one else thought of it until her will was made public. In a handwritten codicil dated August 3, 1957, she had made a very substantial contribution to "my beloved country, the United States of America, to be used for the retirement of the national debt." The contribution to this country was of one-half of the Susan V. Clayton Trust No. 2, the other one-half going to Johns Hopkins University for medical research.

Score of millions of Americans dearly love their country; most would die for it, but few voluntarily make gifts of money to it. Mrs. Clayton was one of those rare persons who so loved this country that in her will she divided her accumulated wealth with it, and said, "To you my beloved country, goes this part of my estate."

Higher patriotism has not been shown by any American in time of peace.

Her surviving husband, Will Clayton, her children, grandchildren, and great grandchildren, have a proud heritage that few can equal.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a story by Marshall Verniaud in the January 14, 1960, issue of the Houston Post, entitled, "Will of Mrs. Clayton Includes Her 'Beloved Country' for Retirement of U.S. Debt."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FOR RETIREMENT OF U.S. DEBT—WILL OF MRS. CLAYTON INCLUDES HER BELOVED COUNTRY

(By Marshall Verniaud)

A bequest to the United States of America "to be used for the retirement of the national debt" was made by Mrs. William L. Clayton in a will and codicil filed for probate Wednesday.

Mrs. Clayton, wife of the cofounder of Anderson, Clayton & Co. and former Under-Secretary of State, also directed bequests to the Texas Children's Hospital, the Clayton Fund, and Johns Hopkins University.

Specific bequests totaling $3,686,000 to her husband, 56 other relatives and 3 servants were included in the handwritten will executed April 18, 1953.

No estimate of the estate's value was available. The petition for probate listed it as having a value "in excess of $100,000."

In a handwritten codicil dated August 3, 1957, Mrs. Clayton directed that one-half of her interest in the Susan V. Clayton Trust No. 2 shall be given "to my beloved country, the United States of America, to be used for the retirement of the national debt."

The remaining half of her interest in this trust will go to Johns Hopkins University for the support of medical research to be designated by a son-in-law, Dr. Benjamin M. Baker, of Baltimore, Md.

The will written on both sides of a single sheet of paper, bequeathed two-thirds of her corporate stock in Anderson, Clayton & Co. to the Texas Children's Hospital, with a proviso that it will be retained by that institution and only the income used.

The remaining one-third of the stock was given to the Clayton Fund, founded by Mr. and Mrs. Clayton.

Any balance of the estate after distribution of designated bequests shall go to the Texas Children's Hospital, Mrs. Clayton directed.

In addition to a bequest of $100,000 to her husband, Mrs. Clayton ordered payment of $100,000 each to four daughters, their husbands, four granddaughters, and five grandsons.

Additional bequests of $50,000 each were made to 5 nieces, 3 nephews, 5 great-nieces, 10 great-nephews, 9 great-great-nieces and 5 great-great nephews.

The will also directed bequests of $25,000 to a sister in-law, $5,000 to a brother, $2,500 each to two servants, and $1,000 to a third servant.

Daughters named in the will were Mrs. W. St. John Garwood, of Austin; Mrs. S. M. McAshan, Jr.; Mrs. John W. Johnson, of Houston; and Mrs. Benjamin M. Baker, of Baltimore.

Granddaughters named to receive bequests were Mrs. Lucy J. Hadac, of Seattle, Wash.; Miss Burdine C. Johnson, of Houston; Mrs. Susan V. Baker and Miss Julia May Baker, of Baltimore.

The five grandsons who will share in the estate are St. John Garwood and William T. Johnson, of Houston; William L. Garwood, of Austin; Benjamin M. Baker, Jr. and William C. Baker, of Baltimore.

Mrs. Clayton died January 7 at the age of 78.

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF SCIENCE

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, during the 1st session of this 86th Congress two bills were introduced which proposed a U.S. Department of Science. One of these bills was S. 586, which I introduced. A second bill, S. 646, was introduced by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY].

Since then, it has become increasingly evident that lack of coordination, bickering, duplication, and absence of leadership among various bureaus, agencies, and branches, are major stumbling blocks in our Nation's efforts to match if not outdistance the Soviets in space and missile developments.

When I appeared before the Subcommittee on Reorganization and International Organizations of the Committee on Government Operations last April 17, I stated:

The outstanding attribute of science is its exactness. If we are to deal with science in our Government, we must also be exact.

It is my serious contention that the quickest course of exactitude in our scientific research and development programs will be found in this bill which I have offered—S. 586.

We need action and we need it fast. Duplication of effort is wasting our resources and money and retarding our country in this very fast and dangerous race. In the Pentagon alone, the maze of committees and departments is enough to confound progress itself.

Mr. Chairman and colleagues on this committee, science in our Nation today is all over the lot.

In spite of the improvements that have been made to correct this situation, we have no overall boss, no Cabinet member to make the ultimate decisions.

For our immediate needs—and they are most immediate—I feel my bill for a Department of Science holds the answer.

To have effective direction of our scientific efforts, we need somebody to call the signals.

Perhaps our ultimate goal is to be found in Senator HUMPHREY's proposal, which would transfer all the functions of science to such a department.

But for the immediate, crying needs of here and now, I feel it is better that we make a start. We can transfer the other functions later as we go along.

I urge that you report out my bill for a Department of Science as quickly as possible.

I was pleased to read in the newspapers of December 29, 1959, that Dr. Wallace R. Brode, the retiring president of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, called for creation of a Cabinet-rank Science Department when he spoke before the group meeting in convention in Chicago.

Dr. Brode expressed the opinion held by many scientists and laymen that the Nation cannot hope to get the most from its scientists unless their genius and energies are better coordinated.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD two newspaper accounts of Dr. Brode's address, as well as an editorial on the subject from the Washington Post and Times Herald.

There being no objection, the articles and editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Star, Dec. 29, 1959]

CABINET-RANK SCIENCE OFFICE URGED FOR UNITED STATES

CHICAGO, December 29.—A ranking Government scientist has called for creation of a Cabinet-rank science department to take over all basic scientific work for all branches of the Federal Government.

Only by establishing such an operating agency, Dr. Wallace R. Brode said last night, will the Nation be able to meet the demands of technology with the scientific assets available.

Dr. Brode, who is serving as science adviser to the Secretary of State and who is on leave as Associate Director of the National Bureau of Standards, outlined his proposal in a speech before the American Association for the Advancement of Science. The talk, entitled "Development of a Science Policy," was Dr. Brode's traditional "swan song" address as retiring president of AAAS.

The scientist, a noted chemist as well as Government administrator, rejected arguments that resulted early this year in the shelving of a proposal to create such an agency. He said the matter should be reopened at once.

WANTS REAL SETUP

"We should be certain that it is in fact as well as in name an operating department," Dr. Brode said. "It should not be a superstructure imposed on existing organizations, but * * * an honest and real effort to mesh the scientific interests and objectives of our Government in the fullest utilization of resources.

"Thus a department of science, while not removing from agencies such as Defense and Agriculture applied research programs specific to their mission, should, however, include all major segments of science not specifically pertinent to an applied mission.

"It should have separate bureaus or institutes with suitable directors of distinction to deal with space, atomic energy, medicine, weather, patent information, physical science, geology, and other recognized areas of importance.

"To provide the * * * administrative head with broad and helpful advice it would seem reasonable to create an advisory council * * * [this] might be helpful in arriving at decisions on extent and character of support which the Government should provide."

SLAPS AT DEFENSE

Dr. Brode noted with alarm the domination of the national research scene by defense agencies, in which he lumped the military services, the Atomic Energy Commission, and the National Aeronautics and Space Administration.

This domination, which he said adds up to about 85 percent of the total basic research bill of the whole American economy, creates a situation of artificial priorities which often works against scientific projects.

A department of science, Dr. Brode said, should be run by scientists and career civil servants. He criticized the procedure to try to find someone to come in from the outside to run a major agency.

"Seldom does one seriously consider the appointment of a career civil servant even though there are in the Government career civil servants who may be recognized in other nations as world authorities * * *."

Speaking generally against this outside recruitment trend, Dr. Brode added:

"The Government should develop within its own establishment sufficient capability to operate its agencies; and our policy decisions, whether they be in science, taxation, or welfare, should not be made without guidance from governmentally experienced personnel."

SCIENCE BUREAU URGED FOR UNITED STATES—BRODE, STATE DEPARTMENT'S ADVISER, OFFERS PLAN TO END WHAT HE CALLS CHAOS

(By Walter Sullivan)

CHICAGO, December 28.—A program designed to end the alleged chaos of this country's scientific effort, stimulate basic research and loosen Government control over universities was proposed today.

Dr. Wallace E. Brode, scientific adviser to the State Department, made the proposal at the annual meeting of the American Association for the Advancement of Science. Dr. Brode, who is the association's outgoing president, emphasized that he was speaking for himself, not the association, or the Government.

The root of his plan is to create a Federal Science Department. He testified for such a step during a congressional hearing on the plan earlier this year.

He proposed that a commission or study group be formed to examine the question of administering American science.

Among his criticisms of the organization of Government research were the following:

"It is dominated by military and quasi-military agencies. Defense, Space, and Atomic Energy Agencies spend $500 million a year, about 85 percent of the total research outlay.

"Universities, having been bailed out of financial difficulties after World War I by defense contracts, are now under excessive control. Each agency feels it should be able to select and direct both recipient and subject of research. Such contracts cover half the total basic research.

"The role of the military has made foreign scientists reluctant to take part in American-sponsored projects.

"With the explosive growth of research in recent years, there has been increasing proliferation of Government agencies concerned with research.

"A function of the National Science Foundation, in Dr. Brode's view, was to take over the Government's role in basic research except where such work was closely linked to the tasks of other Government departments. Instead, the various agencies have been contracting for research in all areas of science, with a consequent lack of coordination and planning."

SAYS PROGRAMS STAND STILL

Dr. Brode said Government agencies were farming out research to industry and universities, whereas programs in Government laboratories were standing still.

Thus, he said, there has been no substantial change since the 1930's in the number of scientists working for the National Bureau of Standards, the Weather Bureau, the Geological Survey, and the Bureau of Mines and Forest Products.

In addition, he noted, civil service status limits their advancement and makes it hard to attract talent.

Dr. Brode also called for a National Science Council, whose membership would bridge the gap between the Government, the academic world, and industry. Centralization of planning, he said, would help free policy-making from the whims of public fancy and political expediency.

He said the Government would be less inclined to go all out for space research one year, and perhaps weather control or new energy sources a year later.

Instead, he argued, there could be long-range planning for a balanced program with enough leeway to preserve the independence of researchers.

Britain and France have taken such a step, he said. He admitted there was opposition to it, even within the association's board. The President's Science Advisory Committee also opposed it early this year, but on synthetic grounds, he added.

While there is a crisis, he warned, it is mild compared with what will exist a decade later, when expenditures for research are expected to double present levels.

A SECRETARY OF SCIENCE?

Among other proposals likely to be made again in Congress for the strengthening of the Nation's scientific efforts will be that to create a Department of Science with a Secretary of Cabinet rank. Many scientists and others in the administration are opposed to this idea, but the science adviser to the State Department and immediate past president of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, Dr. Wallace R. Brode, said in a speech the other day that he thought such a department might be useful. We hope that congressional sponsors of the plan will focus on the objectives. Otherwise the creation of another Federal agency could become an end in itself and could result merely in the imposition of a new layer of administrative supervision, more redtape, and more interagency committees to try to cut it away.

As Dr. Brode sees the objectives, one is to provide a better allocation of Federal funds among the competing scientific programs which the Government either conducts or supports and which, he calculates, account for some 80 percent of the Nation's basic research. This might be accomplished, we suppose, by better scientific staffing of the Budget Bureau, or by fuller use of the recently created Federal Council of Science and Technology, or even by a stronger voice for the science adviser in the White House. Or it might take a new Cabinet office to provide the sustained effort obviously required.

Another objective, Dr. Brode believes, is to upgrade Government scientists so that less scientific work will have to be farmed out and to establish more Government owned and operated laboratories. Again, a Department of Science might be the only way to bring the virtual revolution in pay scales and organization which this would entail—or there might be easier ways. The point is that there is much more at the root of the American scientific lag, already pronounced in some fields and merely imminent in others, than the mere lack of a Department of Science. The coming debate in this field ought to concern itself with the fundamentals, not just the superstructure.

DIVESTITURE OF DU PONT INTEREST IN GENERAL MOTORS CORP.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. President, late last week I found it desirable to again call to the attention of the Senate the necessity for enacting appropriate legislation to prevent shareholders of the Du Pont Co. from the serious and unjustified tax penalties threatened as a result of the pending antitrust case brought by the Government against this corporation.

My statement was issued following an announcement by the Department of Justice that it had appealed the findings of the district court in Chicago which had ruled that divestiture by Du Pont of its General Motors stock was not necessary to effect appropriate relief which the Supreme Court by a 4-to-2 decision had earlier decided would be required.

In my remarks, I invited and urged both the Department of Justice and the Secretary of Treasury to join in supporting legislation to facilitate antitrust enforcement by lowering tax hurdles to the achievement of this goal.

This proposal is embraced in Senate bill 200 and in H.R. 8126 approved during the last session of Congress by the Ways and Means Committee.

Today, I am happy to advise the Senate that the Attorney General has written me a personal letter in which he reiterates the Department of Justice's support for enactment of tax legislation at this session of Congress which would assist the Government in pursuing appropriate enforcement under our antitrust laws.

I now trust, Mr. President, that the statement of the Attorney General will be followed by a similar expression of cooperation by the Secretary of the Treasury to the end that we may have approval of one of these pending bills on this subject before Congress adjourns. Mr. President, I ask that the letter of the Attorney General be printed in full at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D.C., January 15, 1960.

Hon. J. ALLEN FREAR, Jr.,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: I have noted your statement in the Senate yesterday on this Department's decision to appeal to the Supreme Court the district court's decision permitting Du Pont to retain its interest of over $3 billion in General Motors. First, in regard to the U.S. appeal, our position is that the district court's decree fails to remedy that violation the Supreme Court found. Until the Supreme Court determines this issue, the merits of our position, we feel, should be argued before the Supreme Court, and in no other context.

Beyond the question of appeal, you called upon this office and "others" to "join * * * in supporting * * * [legislation] to facilitate antitrust enforcement in eliminating the tax penalties upon forced divestiture" (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 538).

This Department did just that last session of Congress. We expressed the belief that appropriate legislation lowering present tax hurdles to divestiture in antitrust cases could spur effective relief. Such legislation, in addition, would speed enforcement results by obviating the necessity for extending the period of divestiture over a number of years. It was with the goal in mind of prompt and effective antitrust enforcement that the Department recommended enactment of tax legislation to accompany the duty Congress placed on this Department to enforce the antitrust laws.

This continues to be our view. And our hope is that, this session, the Congress will see fit to act favorably on appropriate legislation.

Sincerely,

WILLIAM P. ROGERS,
Attorney General.

PROPOSED LEGISLATION RELATING TO RETIRED OFFICERS IN THE ARMED SERVICES

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I should like at this time to say a word about some bills which I have introduced, which relate to the responsibility of retired officers of the armed services.

I have served on the Committee on Rules and Administration for 2 years, at the feet of our very distinguished colleague, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS]. I hope, after my colleague from New York [Mr. KEATING] has concluded his address, to which I look forward with great interest, to speak upon the pending legislation for a little while this afternoon.

In the meantime, I wish to advert to certain bills which I have introduced in cooperation with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], with respect to the responsibility of retired officers of the military services.

It is very gratifying to me that the Subcommittee for Special Investigations of the House Armed Services Committee, before which I testified last July 8, in support of a bill which the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] and I had introduced, Senate bill 2228, the Retired Military Officers Defense Procurement Activities Act of 1959, has issued a report and proposed legislation which in many respects follows closely the recommendations of Senate bill 2228.

The 2-year "cooling off" period after retirement, during which officers may not participate in "selling" activities to the Department of Defense; the extension of the definition of "selling" to include negotiations, and the permanent exclusion of officers from selling activities directly related to their particular assignments in the services, should offer valuable guidelines to former personnel in their choice of future business connections.

It also becomes our duty to do affirmative acts which will offer a better opportunity for retired officers, as well as to do negative things which will prevent any abuse of what we consider to be a public trust.

Accordingly, I hope that, at the same time we consider the restrictive legislation which I have discussed, we shall also consider one other bill which I introduced on September 12, 1959, which would offer retired officers working for the Federal Government in positions classified as having a shortage of personnel, according to the Civil Service Commission, the opportunity to receive an increased share of their retirement pay, notwithstanding the salaries which they receive in civil service jobs. In this way we can provide retired officers with a career beneficial both to them and their country.

With reference to Senate bill 2703, which I introduced on September 12, 1959, the bill would also require the Civil Service Commission to make a report within 3 years, to help Congress with further legislation along this line.

It is important to bring to the notice of retired military officers that real efforts should be made to keep their fine and honorable status in our country, and that in the complexity inherent in the public concern over their trying to sell defense items to the Defense Department, or to negotiate with their former colleagues, we should also make every effort to utilize their services, which are often so precious, in jobs where we do have a shortage of personnel, and to encourage them to render that kind of service by minimizing the cost to them in terms of their retirement compensation. I hope very much that Congress will, therefore, consider both sides of this coin.

I end by saying what I have maintained time and time again, namely, that I hope that our retired officers will realize our gratitude to them for their services, and that all we are trying to do is to make very clear the ground rules, and that we know from their patriotic service, which they have always rendered to their country, they would be the first to desire the ground rules to be clear, and that, as we may restrict their activities, we also indicate the lines along which they can be extended, which will be beneficial both to the country and to them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed.

FEDERAL ELECTIONS ACT OF 1959

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 571, S. 2436, a bill to revise the Federal election laws, to prevent corrupt practices in Federal elections, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (S. 2436) to revise the Federal election laws, to prevent corrupt practices in Federal elections, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Missouri.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] to add a new section to the pending amendment, which is the Hennings-Keating amendment lettered "C."

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Is the Hennings-Keating amendment the amendment which would make the bill applicable to primary elections?

If that is not a proper parliamentary inquiry, perhaps I could direct the question to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. HENNINGS. I will answer the question in the affirmative. That will be the pending question, following action on the so-called LONG amendment relating to caucuses and conventions.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. On which amendment will the vote first come? Will it be on the Long amendment to the Hennings-Keating amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Parliamentarian advises the Chair that the first vote will occur on the Long amendment to the Hennings-Keating amendment.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, at this time I wish to state how I expect to vote on the Hennings-Keating amendment, and to give a few reasons therefor.

I expect to vote for the Hennings-Keating amendment to include primary elections within the scope of the bill. The reason I shall do so is that I think the primary election is an essential part of being elected to the Senate; or, if the primary election is not used, then the nominating convention which may be provided by State law is an essential part of being elected.

The selection of a party candidate, the nomination of a party candidate, is one of the steps in election.

When I was considering this matter it occurred to me that the notable cases in which there have been election contests before the Senate of the United States—the most outstanding examples of something going wrong, to which the Senate had addressed itself in the past—have been in regard to primary elections. I have in mind the Newberry case in Michigan, the Vare case in Pennsylvania, and the Smith case in Illinois.

In the report on these various contests, in the book compiled by Frank Hays, of the Senate Library, on "Senate Election Cases from 1913 to 1940," these several contests are all dealt with.

In review of the case of Ford against Newberry, the opinion of Chief Justice White is cited. In that citation, this review states:

> The Chief Justice pointed out that the contention of the majority that elections did not include nominating primaries was illogical, for the same clause (of the Constitution: art. I, sec. 4, clause 1) which delegated to the States control over elections and, inferentially, control over primaries, also placed the power of regulation in Congress; that the argument that the powers of election and of nomination were separable and without relation was untenable; that the general powers conferred upon Congress under the necessary and proper clause were also left out of account in the majority opinion; and that the 17th amendment tended to confirm his view as after much debate it was adopted by a resolution of promulgation which reserved to the Congress its power under article I, section 4.

In the report of a committee in the Newberry case, one of the headings is "Primary Election." Under that heading I read this paragraph:

> Your committee condemns the use of such a large sum of money in any primary campaign, but in the instant case there is not the slightest foundation upon which to connect Truman H. Newberry with its solicitation, its acquisition, or its use, nor to condemn him because of the amount. * * * It is but fair to state that the evidence discloses a situation in regard to this primary which perhaps has no parallel in American history.

That was the opinion of the majority. But even in that opinion it is clear that the whole matter with which the committee was charged was that which dealt with what happened in a primary election. It is my feeling that if the cases to which the Senate has addressed itself from time to time have dealt with primary elections, then consistently the bill which we pass at this time should deal with primary elections.

In the report of a committee in this same review of Senate election cases I find that there was quoted a letter which Mr. Arthur H. Vandenberg, editor of the Grand Rapids Herald, wrote to Mr. Newberry on August 8, 1918. He quoted in his letter from the Escanaba Journal of August 2, in an editorial entitled "An Offense to Political Decency."

It—

> Referring to the Newberry campaign—

is being made a money campaign which outclasses the "money barrel" campaigns of 20 and 30 years ago, and if the campaign is to continue unchallenged it will create a condition which must inevitably mean the debauchery of Michigan politics.

I am sure that if the late great Arthur Vandenberg were here today, he would recognize that the dollars necessary to carry on a general campaign, or a primary campaign, back in 1918, would be quite inadequate to carry on a campaign at this time. But if he felt, as he apparently did when he wrote this letter to Mr. Newberry, that the conduct of the primary was an offense to political decency, he would feel that primaries should be embodied in the proposed legislation.

The review further quotes Mr. Vandenberg as saying:

> I direct your attention to these specific charges which have appeared in responsible newspapers. They are charges, furthermore, which find kinship in the very general rumor and report. I fully realize that gossip is a deadly and a ruthless assassin, but gossip, in this instance, is too widespread to be longer ignored. It charges you and your associates with the expenditure of money running into six figures in the erection of your senatorial organization. Such a situation must be as intolerable to you, if these reports are false, as it is intolerable for the State, if the reports are true.

In the summary of the report on the Ford against Newberry case, submitted by the minority, Atlee Pomerene, William H. King, and Henry F. Ashurst, the opening sentence is:

> The exorbitant expenditures in this primary campaign shocked the conscience of the country.

They were dealing not with a general election, but with a primary.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, will my distinguished friend yield for an observation?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. HENNINGS. I am very glad to see that the Senator from South Dakota is, as always, careful, comprehensive, and scholarly in the statements he makes either here or in committee, where he and I have served together in the past.

I take it the Senator is reading from "Senate Election Cases," in part.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. By Hays.

Mr. HENNINGS. From 1913 to 1940?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. That is correct.

Mr. HENNINGS. I am quite sure that the Senator has also read the landmark case of the United States against Classic.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I have not read it recently.

Mr. HENNINGS. That is another very illuminating case which bears upon the question of the constitutionality of Federal election laws and regulations as applied to primary elections. The Senator has noticed, I am sure, that in the "Senate Election Cases" from 1913 to 1940, as we go back, the last case which was considered was the case of Willis against Van Nuys. Preceding that was the case of Hatfield against Holt. Preceding that was the case of Chavez against Cutting; and preceding that were the cases of Long against Overton and Hefflin against Bankhead.

Without further interrupting the Senator, let me say that many of these cases in which the Senate took jurisdiction were primary election cases. Is not that true?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. They dealt with the nomination of a candidate.

Mr. HENNINGS. Indeed. I thank the Senator.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. In the conclusion of the report submitted by the minority in the Ford against Newberry case, Senators Pomerene, King, and Ashurst gave this as their conclusion from the facts disclosed by the record:

As conclusions from the facts disclosed by the record and the findings herein set forth, we are of the opinion—

First. That the irregularities complained of do not relate to the general election but to the primary. Henry Ford did not receive a plurality of the votes cast at the general election. We, therefore, find that the petitioner, Henry Ford, was not elected and is not entitled to a seat in the Senate of the United States.

Second. We find that under the facts and circumstances of this case corrupt and illegal methods and practices were employed at the primary election and that Truman H. Newberry violated the Corrupt Practices Act and the Primary Act of the State of Michigan, and that by reason thereof he ought not to have or hold a seat in the Senate of of the United States, and that he is not the duly elected Senator from the State of Michigan for the term of 6 years commencing on the 4th day of March 1919, and we recommend, therefore, that his seat be declared vacant.

So again I take note of the fact that Members of the Senate in dealing with this case, which was referred to them, and which was their responsibility as members of the committee to investigate, dealt with a primary, and goings on in the primary, rather than with the general election, and dealt with the disbursement of funds in the primary on which the case turned.

Then, similarly in this collection by Mr. Hays of "Senate Election Cases," in the report of Mr. Reed of Missouri from the Special Investigating Committee To Investigate Expenditure in Senatorial Primary and General Elections, I find a paragraph which I believe to be significant. Again there I would point out that the committee, which the able former Senator from Missouri headed, and who was the predecessor of the able Senator who now in part represents the State of Missouri, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS], was entitled "Special Committee Investigating Expenditures in Senatorial Primary and General Elections." In the partial report which Chairman Reed submitted in 1927, there appears this paragraph:

For all practical purposes it may be said that no candidate for the Senate at the last election in the State of Illinois could have any reasonable hope of election unless nominated in the primary by one of the regular party organizations. The intimate relation of the primary and the general election, and the interdependency of the latter upon the former, cannot be subject to any serious dispute.

I should like to reread that paragraph from the report of Chairman Reed of the special committee back in 1927, and invite the comment of the present Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. At page 305.

Mr. HENNINGS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The paragraph to which I direct attention reads as follows:

For all practical purposes it may be said that no candidate for the Senate at the last election in the State of Illinois could have any reasonable hope of election unless nominated in the primary by one of the regular party organizations. The intimate relation of the primary and general election, and the interdependency of the latter upon the former cannot be subject to any serious dispute.

Does the Senator from Missouri agree with the conclusion of his illustrious predecessor, that there is an interdependency, and that the intimate relation between the two cannot be subject to any serious dispute?

Mr. HENNINGS. Well, I would say to the learned Senator from South Dakota that it is quite obvious that we cannot have a general election without having nominees, and that a part of the election process, as I undertook to say, I believe on Wednesday or Thursday, when discussing the amendment at the outset, is the primary, which is a predicate to the nomination and subsequent election of any candidate for the office of U.S. Senator. Of course I do agree with the late Senator James A. Reed in that statement, as do the courts and the Senate precedents, and the cases relating to them.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, at page 318 I read a part of the Senate report to the 69th Congress, 1st session, as follows:

On May 19, 1926, the Senate adopted a resolution creating a special committee and directed it to investigate the expenditures in the senatorial primaries and general elections for the 6-year term in the U.S. Senate beginning March 4, 1927. The Nation's press had charged the employment of corrupt practices and large expenditures in the Pennsylvania primaries of May 18, 1926.

So again, Mr. President, the Senate, as on many other occasions, and as in this case of William S. Vare, took cognizance of what happened in a primary election.

There is one other feature in connection with the Pennsylvania case which is of interest, and that is, as the report points out—

There was no law in Pennsylvania limiting primary expenditures.

Notwithstanding the fact that there was no law in Pennsylvania limiting primary expenditures, the Senate took cognizance of the reports of excessive expenditures and corrupt practices, and went into the matter.

The letter from the Governor of Pennsylvania which transmitted the certification of the returns of the election is of interest in this connection. It appears at page 351 of "Senate Election Cases." The letter was dated at the Governor's office at Harrisburg, Pa., January 8, 1927. Gov. Gifford Pinchot wrote as follows:

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith the returns of the election of U.S. Senator, held on November 2, 1926, as the law of this Commonwealth directs.

I have the honor also to inform you that I have today signed and by registered mail delivered to Hon. William S. Vare, a certificate which is as follows:

"To the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES:

"This is to certify that on the face of the returns filed in the office of the secretary of the Commonwealth of the election held on the 2d day of November 1926, William S. Vare appears to have been chosen by the qualified electors of the State of Pennsylvania a Senator from said State to represent said State in the Senate of the United States for the term of 6 years beginning on the 4th day of March 1927."

The form of words customarily used for such certificates by the Governors of this Commonwealth and the form recommended by the Senate of the United States both include certification that the candidate in question has been "duly chosen by the qualified electors" of the Commonwealth.

I cannot so certify, because I do not believe that Mr. Vare has been duly chosen. On the contrary, I am convinced, and have repeatedly declared, that his nomination was partly bought and partly stolen, and that frauds committed in his interest have tainted both the primary and the general election. But even if there had been no fraud in the election, a man who was not honestly nominated cannot be honestly elected to a seat.

That statement by the Governor of Pennsylvania is pertinent and germane to the debate today. The Governor refused to use the ordinary certification of election. He did say that it appeared on the face of the returns that Mr. Vare had been chosen, but the Governor took pains in his letter to the President of the Senate to say that he could not so certify, because he did not believe that Mr. Vare had been duly chosen. He said that "frauds committed in his interest have tainted both the primary and the general election," and continued: "But even if there had been no fraud in the election, a man who was not honestly nominated cannot be honestly entitled to a seat."

If that is true, and if the Senate of the United States in this previous case, as in the other cases, took cognizance of the fact that a taint rested upon the selection of a party nominee, then, it seems to me, the pending bill, if it is to be a clean elections bill, should embrace primary as well as general elections.

The Pinchot letter concludes:

The stealing of votes for Mr. Vare and the amount and the sources of the money spent in his behalf make it clear to me that the election returns do not in fact correctly represent the will of the sovereign voters of Pennsylvania. Therefore I have so worded the certificate required by law that I can sign it without distorting the truth.

I have the honor to be, sir,

Very respectfully yours,

GIFFORD PINCHOT,
Governor.

I may say, in conclusion, that the vote of the junior Senator from South Dakota will have to be cast for the Hennings-Keating amendment, which would make primary elections, as well as general elections, come within the scope of this law.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I yield.

Mr. HENNINGS. I wish to compliment the distinguished Senator from South Dakota upon his diligence and scholarship, and for taking the trouble to read the cases, to analyze them, and to present them to the Senate in his customarily effective and forceful fashion.

I may say to the able Senator that it has been a source of profound doubt in my mind as to the specific reasons, aside from various oblique and offside attacks which have been made upon the primary election reporting provision, why any Senator would not want the people of his State to know who the contributors to his campaign in the primary election were, and in what amounts those contributions were made. Why should there be reluctance on the part of the Senate to take moral leadership in this matter?

In this blessed year of 1960, when we are confronted with challenges and difficulties and crises of all manner, I do not understand why we in the U.S. Senate should seriously question the desirability, forthrightness, and honesty of reporting publicly the source of contributions to candidates' nominations, as well as their elections. I cannot understand, for the life of me, the reluctance on the part of some of our colleagues to make such information a matter of public record and understanding. The people have a right to know who support candidates, and to what extent such support may be manifested by contributions of money.

If the Senator from South Dakota could enlighten me as to what he believes a substantial argument contrariwise might be, I should be very happy to try to meet it.

The distinguished minority leader [Mr. DIRKSEN] said last Thursday that the State of Illinois had no such regulations whatsoever, either as to the primary elections or the general elections.

The Senator from South Dakota is well aware that the Senate had a very unhappy circumstance resulting from that, and perhaps other known defects of the Corrupt Practices Act of 1925, which is now sought to be amended, in the case of Frank L. Smith, which is one of the cases which I had intended to discuss, and shall discuss later, relating to the right of the Senate to inquire about corrupt practices employed to secure nominations to the Senate. Senator James A. Reed, of Missouri, one of my illustrious predecessors, offered the motion to investigate. As the Senator well knows, the inquiry was had, and it was found that Mr. Smith had received contributions in enormous amounts from, among others, the former utilities magnate, Samuel Insull; that Mr. Smith was nominated; and, on the face of the returns, apparently elected, although he was not seated in the Senate.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I was about to conclude my remarks, but I think the points and the statements which the Senator from Missouri has made are very pertinent.

As to the reasons for Senators opposing the amendment, I am not advised. In general, I had understood there was a theory that State sovereignty might be involved; that the State had the right to establish its own method of choosing its nominees for the Senate. But that theory, of course, could be equally applicable to the election of Senators.

I think any position to the effect that the Senate does not have the right—either the moral right or the legal right—to go into the primary, overlooks the record of the fact that the Senate has, in the cases I have cited, the Vare case, the Smith case, and the Newberry case, made an examination into what happened in the primaries, and that it was on the basis of what happened in the primaries principally that the Senate created special committees, or took whatever action it did take.

Mr. HENNINGS. It is, of course, true that in some States nomination means election, so if we imposed the so-called Corrupt Practices Act of 1925, as has been done in fiction, if not in fact, upon all States of the Union, is there any reason why in certain States, which have no reporting provisions—Illinois, for example, it not being a Southern State—candidates for the U.S. Senate should not divulge information to the public, so that the contributions to their campaigns may be subject to public knowledge and scrutiny? Thus it will be possible to determine the fitness of candidates for public office, and to determine the extent and nature of the support which candidates for office are getting. Such information may then be weighed as one factor—not necessarily the determining factor, but a factor—to enable the voters to make up their minds whom they want to have represent them.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I see no reason why the law should not apply to both elections. In my State of South Dakota, there is a requirement for the disclosure of contributions and disbursements in primary elections, just as there is in the case of general elections.

I conclude by reiterating what Chief Justice White pointed out, that the argument that the powers of election and of nomination were separable and without relation was untenable; and with the conclusion of Governor Pinchot that even if there had been no fraud in an election, a man who is not honestly nominated cannot be honestly entitled to a seat.

Since the Senate has recognized that doctrine in the past by instituting tests and by coming to judgment upon evidence developed in connection with primary elections, it seems to me it would be most inconsistent and untenable for the Senate now to pass a so-called clean elections bill and not encompass primaries as well as general elections.

Mr. HENNINGS. I thank the distinguished Senator from South Dakota for his very cogent and comprehensive presentation, which I think is invulnerable and, indeed, unassailable.

Mr. President, at this time I should like to read, for the RECORD from an editorial which was published last week—on January 15—in the New York Times:

FIRST BUSINESS

The first major legislative business of the Senate in the present session is the bill to revise the antiquated campaign expenditures law, which in its essence has been on the books since 1925.

For years the hyprocrisy of the existing statute in the light of actual conditions has been apparent. Regularly, after each presidential election, the American public is duly shocked to learn that millions upon millions of scarcely controlled dollars have been spent by and on behalf of both parties—no one knows how much—and regularly there is a great fever to do something about it, a fever that lasts a few weeks or months before subsiding again into complacent normalcy. If the national figures who talk about morality and crusades would spend a little less time moralizing and a little more in giving hard political support to specific measures for reform of concrete political evils, our democratic institutions would be on firmer ground than they are.

One of these evils is the inadequacy of the laws governing campaign expenditures, now theoretically limited to a maximum of $25,000 for Senators, $5,000 for Representatives, and $3 million for interstate political committees. There is nothing inherently good in the fact that the actual amounts spent in many campaigns are much higher; but there is something inherently bad in a law that sets limitations so unrealistic that they are constantly evaded. Therefore the proposal to raise materially these limitations, and to provide for fuller publicity as to the sources of contributions, is sound.

The present bill is, however, inadequate on two main counts. One is that it does not apply to primaries, which in at least a fourth of the States are the equivalent of elections.

I may say that to remedy that condition is the purpose of the pending amendment.

I read further from the editorial:

The other is that it sets no limit on total contributions of one individual, providing for merely a $5,000 top to any single candidate or to any single committee.

Again I may say, Mr. President, that I propose to offer an amendment to cure that inadequacy. I offered such an amendment in the Committee on Rules and Administration, where I also offered the amendment which deals with primaries. The latter amendment was rejected by the committee, by a vote of five to four; and the bill was reported to the Senate without that amendment.

I read further from the editorial:

These deficiencies are serious; but a bill that included primaries would probably fail through the usual combination of conservative Republican and southern Democratic votes.

I say if this occurred, it would be a great tragedy. The Senate of the United States is not likely to have an opportunity to pass on legislation on this kind, character, and objective for a very long time. We have been trying to do so since I first introduced an elections bill in 1955. We had an elections bill on the calendar in the years 1955, 1957, and 1959, reported out of the Committee on Rules and Administration. However, we have not had an opportunity to pass on any bills relating to Federal elections since the enactment of the so-called Corrupt Practices Act in 1925.

For that reason I think the Senate has a clear, well-defined duty that is unmistakable, and not subject to a respectable difference of opinion, to see to it that the people have a right to know who finances campaigns, whether they be primary campaigns or in general elections.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. In just 1 minute I shall be very glad to yield to the Senator from Oregon.

For example, in the 1926 election in the State of Illinois, the late Samuel Insull, the largest manager and owner of public utility corporations in Illinois, contributed $125,000 to the campaign of Mr. Frank L. Smith for the U.S. Senate. Of course, those were 1926 dollars, not 1960 dollars. To say that Mr. Insull's interest was entirely that of good government in the broad sense I think would strain the imagination and credulity of any reasonable or experienced man, and of particularly the Members of this body, who have themselves been through primaries and general elections, and who know something of what is done behind the scenes, what is done under the table, what is done without benefit of light of day, who know about cash contributions which are offered by some persons who do not want their names published, for various reasons, and, indeed, some members of the underworld. It would be very embarrassing, indeed, for some candidates for office to have to list the names of some of their less respectable contributors; and it would be even more embarrassing to have to say that certain interests or certain individuals had contributed so substantially to the primary process, in order to enable the candidate to present himself in the general election for election to this body, it would be a matter of deep and grave concern, not only to that candidate, were he to accept such contributions, but it would be a matter of deep and grave concern to some of the donors who expect something in return, who are not, by and large, so public spirited in many instances—and I speak of the disproportionate contributions such as that of Mr. Insull in 1926, of the equivalent of something like $300,000 today, to nominate one man in the State of Illinois for the U.S. Senate.

Why in heaven's name, Mr. President, this question should have to be a matter of protracted consideration and debate, as it has been for many years, is beyond my simple understanding, unless, for reasons best known to ourselves, some Senators think that primaries are none of the people's business; that what happens in the primaries should not be known to the people of this country; that a man has a right by some magic or other, by the investiture of certain talents, powers, and gifts, to appear as a nominee on the ticket.

Now, Mr. President, I am glad to yield to my friend, the very able Senator from Oregon.

Mr. NEUBERGER. I thank my colleague from Missouri. When the Senator from Missouri was mentioning the fact that it may be a long time hence before, once again, the question of campaign financing comes before the U.S. Senate, I was moved to say to him that I think many of us realize this paramount question would not be here today if it were not for the persistent and tireless and indefatigable efforts of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. HENNINGS. I thank my friend from Oregon.

Mr. NEUBERGER. I salute him for his great contribution.

Mr. HENNINGS. I could not, however, quite associate myself with the suggestion that I have been tireless. This has been a long and unrewarding labor, with very few persons indicating any great interest or burning desire to help us reform ourselves and face up to the honest reality of political campaigning. I thank the Senator from Oregon, who has made many contributions along these lines, and who has, indeed, himself offered a bill which has very much merit. I should like to hear a further exposition of the Senator's bill as a part of the debate upon the pending amendment and subsequent amendments which some of us shall offer.

Mr. NEUBERGER. I assure the Senator from Missouri of my support for his dual effort, first to have primary elections brought within the scope of his bill, and, second, to establish an overall limitation on what any one individual can contribute to candidates or political groups in this country. I feel that the "dark continent" of American politics is the whole question of political campaign spending.

I have noted that a well-known author, William S. White, has declared that in a relatively small State it takes $100,000 to elect a U.S. Senator, and that in some of the great industrial States it takes a minimum of $1 million to elect a U.S. Senator.

In my own campaign in the State of Oregon in 1954, approximately $103,000 was spent on my campaign, and about $176,000 was spent on the campaign of my Republican opponent. In my opinion, both sums probably were somewhat too large.

It is my hope that eventually the time will come in the United States when no candidates for office will be dependent upon any benefactions from private sources, be they from persons engaged in industry and management or be they from trade unions.

I am sponsoring a bill, to which the Senator from Missouri very kindly referred, which is based on a special message to Congress by one of our greatest Presidents, a Republican President, Theodore Roosevelt, in 1907, a half century ago. Even in that distant time, before the age of television and radio, Theodore Roosevelt was disturbed by the huge campaign benefactions of the type which the Senator from Missouri discussed, namely, the Insull contributions in Illinois. So Theodore Roosevelt proposed that the U.S. Government should finance political campaigns, to free all candidates from the potential servitude occasioned by being indebted to private sources.

I have introduced a bill in that respect. I shall not offer it as an amendment to the bill of the able Senator from Missouri, because I realize that an innovation of this sort, as to which no committee hearings have been held, would not receive the number of votes to which its serious purpose would entitle it, unless extensive committee hearings were able to be held.

I think the Senator from Missouri is probing at the very root of our political processes. There is a sort of double standard in American public life which I do not understand. Many people say that if the assistant to the President of the United States, for example, should receive a coat of vicuna cloth, the assistant to the President of the United States is perforce obligated to do some special interest mission for the person who gave the coat; or, if an assistant to another President of the United States should receive a Deepfreeze, let us say, that he is inescapably obligated to the giver of the Deepfreeze. However, nothing is said about the fact that a President of the United States himself may be obligated to oil companies or utility companies not for a coat or for a Deepfreeze, but for hundreds of thousands of dollars in campaign contributions. Evidently, no obligation runs from that.

I again want to compliment the Senator from Missouri. I assure the Senator of such support and influence as I can offer in his effort to tighten up the provisions of the law, to make them apply to primaries, to put an overall limit on what one person can give, and to otherwise contribute to the effectiveness of the legislation which the Senator is so ably sponsoring.

Mr. HENNINGS. I thank my good friend, the able and erudite Senator from Oregon, for his generous remarks.

I wonder if the Senator can tell me why there is such a reluctance on the part of the Members of the Senate to tell the people where they get the money to finance their campaigns. Is it that we hold ourselves above some of the other functions, agencies, and departments of the Federal Government? Is it because we think we are invested with some sacred immunity—some sacrosanct, above-the-law, above-the-common-experience, above-the-common-observation, cloak? Or is it simply a general idea that things have been going along pretty well as they are, that every one here has somehow been elected under the antiquated 1925 act, so why disturb things?

Why should we let a wave of apathy and indifference and opposition overwhelm any efforts whatsoever to do anything about this matter? We try to hold ourselves up to the world, and indeed as a body in the Senate we hold ourselves up to the American people, as being above the taint of corruption and influence and suggestion improperly conveyed and made, yet we are faced with an opportunity to do something about the situation and there is all this scrambling around in an effort to evade, to avoid, and to duck.

There is talk about invading the sovereignty of States and of State election officials and State commissioners. In regard to Illinois, the minority leader has told us there is no requirement whatsoever in that State, that one can do exactly as he pleases in both the primary election and in the general election, without reporting to anybody at any time. Now there must be a report under the obsolete, antiquated, and shamefully ineffective, abused and violated, Corrupt Practices Act of 1925.

There are many, indeed, who would be satisfied to go along with this hypocrisy and this nonsense, this making a pretext of filing reports under that act, knowing full well the act does not reach anybody at any time in any consequential or meaningful way.

So there has been no effort to do much about this, until rather recently.

Mr. NEUBERGER. To answer the question of the Senator from Missouri, I am afraid there is a slight tendency here to hold up higher standards for others than we have for ourselves. We often undertake to investigate various Federal officials, bureaus, and others to determine, for example, if they have accepted favors in the form of trips or entertainment or other benefactions. Yet at the same time there is a corresponding effort to conceal not the relatively small things, like some excursion, but the enormous campaign contributions which are often required to elect somebody to the U.S. Senate.

As John Selden said:

Preachers say, "Do as I say, not as I do."

Mr. HENNINGS. "Do as I say."

Mr. NEUBERGER. We have that practice in the Senate.

I feel that the bill presented by the Senator from Missouri offers all Members of the Senate an opportunity to end this hypocrisy.

Mr. HENNINGS. If we get down to it, I will say to the Senator from Oregon, it really resolves itself into an exceedingly simple ultimate question, does it not?

Mr. NEUBERGER. It certainly does.

Mr. HENNINGS. The question is, Do we want the people to know what we are doing in order to be nominated and elected, or do we not want them to know?

By voting against this proposed amendment we shall in effect be saying, "This is none of the people's business." As Commodore Vanderbilt was once quoted as saying, although he said it in a different context, "The public be damned."

Mr. NEUBERGER. I think—and I know the Senator from Missouri, as his action demonstrates, also thinks—that the American public has a right to know about funds which are invested in electing the officials who are elected to govern them. That is the key of the issue before us today.

Mr. HENNINGS. The Senator mentioned another thing, Mr. President, which I believe is very important; that is, the undertaking of a candidate to raise funds for his nomination and for his election should he be nominated.

I individually have always felt considerable embarrassment in that process. I have been nominated six times and have been elected six times to office, five of those times being election to the House and to the Senate. It has always seemed to me that when a man gives a very substantial amount, unless he is a man who is of considerable means and is highly public spirited, or a man who is a great believer in his party and who wishes to augment and increase his party's representation in the Congress, his action should be carefully scrutinized. There are many contributions offered. Some are refused, I am sure, by many Senators. I refer especially to the instance regarding the able Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CASE] known to all of us, when a campaign contribution was offered to him and refused by him.

Mr. NEUBERGER. We all recall that episode.

Mr HENNINGS. We recall that. We recall the Senator's embarrassment. We recall his forthright honesty in presenting the matter to the Senate at the time of consideration of some proposed legislation of vital importance to many Members, and indeed to the whole country.

The process of trying to raise money for campaigns I think does lead us to a conclusion, ultimately, that while the country at this time may not be quite ready for what the learned Senator from Oregon has suggested, sooner or later that may be the point at which we will arrive. It may be necessary to do so, so that men will enter this and other legislative bodies free from any suggestion of taint or corruption or influence, as these factors may affect their decisions on matters relating to the welfare of the country at large.

I may say to the Senator that my own thinking on the matter, as we have been trying to set the figures, has been that we should attempt to set the amount as realistically as possible, to try to keep the funds allowed somewhat in relation to the demands of modern campaigning, with modern media, involving increased costs since 1925, and such cognate things.

However, we are still confronted with the very deep—and I think distressing—moral problem of the extent to which a candidate for office, a nominee for office, or an officeholder is under obligation to some of his contributors if that obligation to his contributors or the interests of some of his contributors is in conflict with what his conscience tells him to be the public interest and the public welfare.

Mr. NEUBERGER. I think it is signficant, in connection with the very point raised by the Senator from Missouri, that more than half a century ago Theodore Roosevelt faced this problem. The reason I emphasize the long hiatus since then is the fact that, in 1907, a political campaign cost only a fraction of what it costs today. An entire campaign could be financed for what one major network television broadcast costs a political committee today; yet even in that bygone era, Theodore Roosevelt was highly alarmed and disturbed over the huge campaign contributions on which candidates for the Presidency, the Vice Presidency, and both Houses of Congress were then relying. In his opinion, the only ultimate solution was Federal financing of the campaigns, to free candidates from all dependence on campaign contributions. Unless we enact legislation of the sort advocated by the Senator from Missouri, with the tightening amendments proposed by him and some of his colleagues, we shall hasten the time when Theodore Roosevelt's proposal will become effective, when no private campaign contributions will be permitted.

Again I compliment the Senator from Missouri for the great and persistent leadership he has shown in this important effort in the Senate.

Mr. HENNINGS. I thank my good friend from Oregon very much for his generosity. No one ever does anything alone. I have received a great deal of help from the staff and from other Senators on various phases of this problem over the years. I hope that some of this work may be reflected when we come to vote upon some of the amendments which would tend to make elections more honest and to make it easier for office holders to be more forthright and considerate, in the objective sense, of the public interest.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, I should like to express a brief concluding thought with respect to Theodore Roosevelt's proposal, which is embodied in the proposed legislation which I have introduced.

Some of our friends on the Republican side of the aisle express great alarm and abhorrence over contributions made to Democrats from the political-action funds of trade unions. Conversely, many Democrats voice anxiety over contributions made to Republican officeholders by those who are leaders in management and big business. If the proposal of Theodore Roosevelt were law, there would be no such big contributions, either from labor unions or from big business. Both such reliances would be wiped out, and all officeholders would enter upon their offices on equal footing, with no obligations either to labor or to management, which might possibly conflict with their public responsibility.

Mr. HENNINGS. I thank the Senator very much for his able and illuminating contributions.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. The Senator knows that I have offered an amendment to the Senator's amendment.

Mr. HENNINGS. Yes; I understand that the Senator's amendment is the pending amendment.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I was hopeful that the Senator would be able to agree to that amendment, requiring that primaries actually shall be held by both major parties.

Mr. HENNINGS. I would say that I do not know that I would have the authority to agree to any amendment. I do not run the Senate.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I believe the Senator could accept my amendment as a modification of his amendment. I was hopeful that the Senator would see fit to accept my amendment to his amendment, which would require that primaries shall be held in all States.

Mr. HENNINGS. May I ask this question of the Senator? If the Senator's amendment were accepted, would the Senator vote for the amendment I have offered relating to primaries?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I would be strongly inclined to vote for it.

Mr. HENNINGS. Would the Senator from Louisiana vote for it?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I would be constrained to vote for it.

Mr. HENNINGS. "Constrained" is a very fancy word. Would the Senator vote for it?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I would expect to vote for it; yes. It is for that reason that I inquire the Senator's attitude toward my amendment. If it is to be resisted, I may not insist on it at this time, and let the Senator's amendment come to a vote first. However, it did seem to me that if we wished to regulate primaries we should require that all States hold them. I would therefore inquire of the Senator if he would accept my amendment to his amendment.

Mr. HENNINGS. That presents an entirely new question, of course, because the Senator did not suggest his amendment to the committee at the time the bill was reported. I am a little surprised that the Senator from Louisiana should offer his amendment, because the Senator is well known for his position relating to so-called States' rights and primary elections. Would the Senator go a step further and say that the Federal Government should prescribe the manner and means by which the State elections should be held? As I understood the Senator's amendment——

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I believe I have made my position clear.

Mr. HENNINGS. I was here when the Senator stated his position.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I would be constrained to go along with the amendment the Senator has offered if my amendment were accepted, to require that all States hold primary elections—that is, by the major parties—as my amendment would provide. I was hopeful that the Senator from Missouri would be able to accept the amendment to the amendment which he has offered. I did not know that his amendment was a committee amendment. Is it a committee amendment?

Mr. HENNINGS. No; it is not a committee amendment. It reflects the thinking of four members of the committee.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I would hope that the Senator could accept my amendment to his amendment. If he could not accept it, I would be reluctant to insist upon it at this time. I would rather wait to see what happens to his amendment. However, I thought it might be clear that it would be fair that some of those who would like to regulate primary elections would be willing also to submit to primary elections. That might be a fair premise, so far as the junior Senator from Louisiana is concerned.

Mr. HENNINGS. The Senator from Louisiana is well aware that the amendment contains a provision relating to caucuses and conventions, as well as referring to primaries.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Yes; a person named by a caucus or convention has hardly any expense, and in many instances the expense is only negligible. In most instances there is very little expense involved to a person nominated in that fashion, particularly if he has the support of the choice of the convention for the governorship. If the nominee for Governor supports a person for the nomination for Senator in a caucus or convention, there may be no expense at all to the person nominated for the Senate.

If we are to have the Federal Government regulate primary elections, it might be well to require that there be primaries. In that way the democratic process would be followed. I would hope that the Senator would accept the amendment which I have offered to his amendment. If he cannot accept it, I may not insist upon it at this time. I would rather withdraw it to see what the result of the vote on his amendment may be.

Mr. HENNINGS. To borrow the Senator's phrase, I am constrained to say that I cannot accept the amendment as such, because the amendment would seem to me to limit the States with respect to their internal systems of the nominating processes. At this time I would think it unwise to say that a State which holds a convention or a caucus for the nomination of candidates must necessarily be driven to hold primaries, as well, although there are very few States that do not have primaries.

Mr. LONG. The Senator cannot agree to accept my amendment at this time. Therefore, I will ask to withdraw my amendment to the Senator's amendment, and reserve the right to offer the amendment as an amendment to the bill in the event the Senator's amendment shall be agreed to.

Mr. HENNINGS. The Senator has that right. I do not feel that I have a right to accept the amendment.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may withdraw my amendment to the amendment at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has that right. The amendment to the amendment is withdrawn. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS].

Mr. HENNINGS. At this time I yield the floor.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, the action of the Senator from Louisiana in withdrawing his proposed amendment to the amendment makes unnecessary some of the observations which I wished to make in opposition to his amendment. However, he has raised an argument which I believe should be met in part in the general outline and context of his remarks.

The argument has been raised that the amendment in chief, of which the Senator from Missouri and I are the authors, would apply unfairly to certain States, because they do have primaries, while other States do not. I apprehend that the Senator from Louisiana would still be opposed to the amendment.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one further observation?

Mr. KEATING. I yield.

Mr. HENNINGS. I missed some of what the learned Senator said.

I assume the Senator has made the point, or intends to make the point further, of our learned friend, the junior Senator from Louisiana, that the essence of the bill, in its primary ingredients, is in terms of the importance of reporting moneys received, moneys used, and the source of those moneys. I am not deeply concerned whether a State has a primary election or a convention. We have tried to keep the bill within certain boundaries and limitations, so as not to make it the subject of all manner of oblique and irrelevant attacks upon it.

I think it is very important that we bear in mind that truth telling concerning sources and amounts contributed is what we are really seeking to accomplish. I would even be willing, were it not for the fact that I do not think the public mind might be quite conditioned to it at this time, to raise the ceilings even more than we have, assuming that everything is reported. That is the basis of the proposed legislation and the philosophy behind it.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield?

Mr. KEATING. I yield.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. It seems to me that sooner or later the Federal Government must and will approach adoption of the type of suggestion made by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER]. I believe if that is done, it will have to be done on the basis of reimbursing candidates for their actual expenditures in campaigns, and with some relation to the vote which a candidate receives in an election.

It is my attitude, based on what I have seen in politics over a period of years, that whether or not such reporting is required, it will not be possible to eliminate the effect resulting from campaign contributions. It is the attitude of some of us—certainly it is my attitude—that the way to get away from the influence which follows contributions to political campaigns is to work out, eventually, a system whereby the Government will pay the necessary expenditures of those who offer themselves for office.

I have not had a chance to study the Neuberger bill. I have some ideas about how the same purpose might be accomplished from a different approach. It seems to me, however, that if we begin to regulate primary elections, it will be well to require such regulation in all States; but I do not care to insist upon it at this time, in view of the fact that there is strong sentiment in the Senate that we should not undertake to regulate primaries at all.

Frankly, I find the problem to be not so much the reporting of money, but more a question of how to get it so as to run for office. It has been my experience that money has been extremely hard to get in order to enable one to run in a Democratic primary. I cannot speak of Republican primaries, because I have had no experience with them.

Mr. HENNINGS. The Senator from Louisiana knows that his own distinguished father was involved in a contest with the late Senator Overton.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. He was involved in a contest as counsel for the late Senator Overton, whose election was investigated.

Mr. HENNINGS. The only point I wished to make relating to that incident was that the Senate took recognition of the fact that it had jurisdiction over a primary election. Is not that correct?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. To investigate it, yes. Of course, as the Senator from Missouri knows, the Senate can investigate anything. We have committees which have investigated baseball, football, juvenile delinquency, and everything else under the sun.

Mr. HENNINGS. Before the Reorganization Act was passed, the Senate had a standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, which was composed of some 18 members. That committee was confined to and had as its purpose the investigation of contested elections, expulsions, and matters relating to Federal elections. The Senator is well aware of the fact that among the precedents there are many, such as the case of Heflin against Bankhead, and the case of the able Senator's distinguished father versus Senator John H. Overton, relating to matters occurring in the Louisiana primary.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I do not believe the Senator from Missouri will find that that happened to be an election in which my father was a candidate.

Mr. HENNINGS. That is true.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. The election to which the Senator from Missouri refers was one in which John Overton was a candidate. If I might be permitted to relate an incident in that connection, without trespassing unduly on the time of the Senator from New York, I should like to do so.

Mr. KEATING. Any incident which the Senator from Louisiana relates will be of interest.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I should like to note, in connection with that election, that Senator Overton had previously been a candidate for election to the Senate, prior to the time when Huey Long was Governor of Louisiana.

There is a story told about it. Although I was not of an age at the time to know much about it, I have heard the story.

It seems that when Senator Overton ran the first time, he received a pitiful number of votes in New Orleans. That accounted for his defeat. To show his gratitude for the few voters who voted for him in New Orleans, the late Senator Overton went to New Orleans and inserted an advertisement in the newspapers inviting as his guests the relatively few persons who had voted for him. Unfortunately, there was some misunderstanding, because thousands of people showed up. The hotel simply did not have the accommodations to make it possible to handle so large a number of persons.

A subsequent election, the one to which the Senator from Missouri makes reference, was, I believe, one of the few times that the Old Regular organization in New Orleans supported the same candidate supported by my father. They did not support Huey Long for office, but they did support Senator Overton in that election. So on that occasion it was the time for the other side to complain about what happened in the city of New Orleans. I do not believe there was ever a moment's question that Senator Overton had received a very substantial majority, and that if there had been any irregularities in the election, they were more than overshadowed by the very large majority that he achieved in the particular election.

However, the junior Senator from Louisiana has always had the feeling that those who criticized events that happened in his father's time in Louisiana, should also direct attention to what the other fellow was doing at the same time. For example, when Huey Long ran for Governor for the first time, in the great city of New Orleans he received, I believe, only about 12,000 votes out of the large number cast. Fantastically, he was greeted by large and enthusiastic crowds; yet in the returns he had very few votes in New Orleans, although elsewhere he received a large majority. I have seen that type of thing happen.

I have always thought that one of the largest contributing factors to the death of my father was the elimination of the poll tax which he fought to achieve. It doubled the number of electors. This, I believe, contributed to his assassination in that a large number of people felt that he would be in office as long as he cared to run, once the number of electors in the State of Lousiana had been doubled.

The junior Senator from Louisiana has noticed, although he does not consider himself to be equal in ability to his late father, that his own majorities have exceeded the total vote which his father received in elections, whenever his father stood for office. If Huey Long had lived to run for office after the poll tax was eliminated, his majorities would have been far greater than mine.

Mr. HENNINGS. The junior Senator from Louisiana is a worthy successor to any Senator Louisiana has ever had, in my opinion. As the Senator well knows, I do not mention this except to indicate that even in the Southern States contestants have submitted themselves to the Senate in matters relating to primaries.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I have no doubt whatever that Congress has the right to regulate primary elections. There is no doubt in my mind that Congress has the power to regulate primary elections for Senator or Congressman in the greatest detail, if Congress wishes to do so. In appropriate cases I favor it. As a matter of fact, I am a cosponsor of a constitutional amendment to eliminate the poll tax——

Mr. HENNINGS. I am sure he is.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. For primary elections, as well as in the general election, for the election of Members of Congress.

Mr. HENNINGS. Being the able lawyer that he is, the Senator from Louisiana does not take the position that any requirement of the reporting of the financing of primary elections is unconstitutional, does he?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. No. It is only my position that if that is to be done——

Mr. HENNINGS. If that is to be done, the Senator from Louisiana would have it established as a matter of policy, not a matter of constitutionality; is that correct?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. That is correct. It is my point of view that if we are to do that—if we are to regulate primaries—it might be well actually to require that there be primary elections. That was the basis on which I offered my amendment to the pending amendment.

In Louisiana, one who wishes to run for election to be Senator or a Member of the House of Representatives pays a $500 qualifying fee, which assures that his name will be placed on the ballot, even though there is no assurance that he will receive any votes.

It seemed to me, and it still does, that usually the candidates of one of the major parties are almost certain to be elected, in most States. I cannot speak of all the States; but I know that in most States the candidates of the major parties are the ones who are most likely to be elected.

So it seemed to me that there should be an opportunity for the people and for the members of the parties to vote as to whom the candidates should be. I am not insisting on the adoption of that amendment; and the Senator from Missouri and I may not agree about it; however if his amendment is adopted, I would like to have my amendment to it adopted, as a part of the bill.

Mr. HENNINGS. The Senator from Louisiana is aware that this is a reporting amendment, and it would relate to primaries, conventions, and caucuses. So they have been contemplated and taken into consideration.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. But the point I had in mind, in connection with the reporting part of the process, is that if we take first things first, then we should first require that there be an election, if we are to require that someone report his costs in an election.

In the case of party caucuses, in many instances there is no expense whatever for the candidates. In many instances, in States where the caucus and convention system prevails, a strong candidate for election to be Governor in a position to determine who will go on the party's ticket with him.

But on the other hand, there may be other persons who, if they had an opportunity to submit themselves in a primary election, might be successful.

Mr. HENNINGS. And the Senator from Louisiana thinks, does he, that the Empire State of the Union has not quite enough democracy at this point—in other words, not enough public participation.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I would not quite say that. I imagine New York State probably has too much Republicanism at the present time. [Laughter.]

But, if we are going to regulate primaries, I feel that it would be desirable to require that primaries be held.

Mr. HENNINGS. I thank the Senator from New York for yielding to me, Mr. President.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I have listened with great interest to the colloquy between the distinguished Senator from Missouri, and the distinguished Senator from Louisiana. In connection with their colloquy, I merely wish to join in sharing the views of the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] about the great merit of our friend, the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], who differs with me in regard to the desirability of adoption of the pending amendment and also his amendment to the pending amendment. However, all the Members of this body hold in the highest regard the distinguished junior Senator from Louisiana, who certainly is the peer of any Senator who in the past has represented the State of Louisiana.

Mr. President, it seems to me that the Senator from Louisiana, in advancing his contention, overlooks the fact that the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri, on behalf of himself and myself, covers not only primaries but also "a convention or a caucus of a political party held for the purpose of nominating candidates."

In my case, I was not only the selection of the great Governor of the great State of New York. In addition, the only avowed candidate for election to the U.S. Senate who at that time had announced his candidacy was apparently convinced that the junior Senator from New York was a deserving young man, and was so kind as to nominate the junior Senator from New York in the convention. In other words, the Senator from Louisiana has laid great stress upon the views of the Governor of one of the States that does not have a primary for the selection of a candidate for election to membership in the U.S. Senate; but I assure him that more than that is required in order for one to be nominated to run for election to the U.S. Senate. The delegates to the convention which is held in the State of New York—and a few other States have this system—were chosen by the Republicans, in primary elections throughout the State, to represent them at that convention.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri and myself would cover the activities of that convention, just as it would cover matters connected with primaries in other States, wherever primaries are held, and where that method of choosing such candidates is used.

The important point is to assure that all methods of selecting nominees are covered; and this seems to me to be of particular importance in the case of the States in which victory in the primary or in the party caucus or in the party convention—whatever method is used—is tantamount to election.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield to me?

Mr. KEATING. I am happy to yield to the distinguished Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I thank the Senator from New York for the very fine compliment he paid me. Let me state that I have the greatest admiration for the Senator from New York and for his service in this body.

I wish to ask him whether, as a practical matter, the situation in his State is somewhat the way the situation is in the State which I have the honor to represent in part, in that when a candidate for Governor is selected, and when one person is to be chosen as a candidate for his ticket, from that point forward the candidate for Governor can fairly well determine whom he wants to go on the ticket with him.

Mr. KEATING. I must respond in that connection, because, apparently, my friend, the Senator from Louisiana, did not follow very closely the campaign in New York in the fall of 1958. What he has just referred to was one of the issues in that campaign. The candidate for reelection as Governor, who was chosen by the party of the Senator from Louisiana, selected as his choice for his running mate someone other than the man who eventually was nominated. The convention did not agree with the Democratic candidate for Governor and picked another man.

It so happened that, happily, in my case the convention agreed with the candidate for Governor; and throughout the election, a beautiful, tranquil relationship existed between the junior Senator from New York and the Governor of New York, whereas on the other side, unhappily for them, that did not occur. So it does not always take place.

So in New York the candidate for election to the U.S. Senate is separately selected by the convention.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. It has been the experience of the junior Senator from Louisiana, at the only convention he ever attended, where a candidate was to be picked—and it was a convention to select a candidate for election as President—that once the Democratic candidate is nominated, he can usually determine who will go on the ticket, for election as Vice President.

It seems to me that in most instances when a Governor is being selected for a party ticket, it would be the rule, rather than the exception, that the candidate for Governor could, if he wished to do so, determine who would go on the ticket with him.

Mr. KEATING. Let me put it in this way: If I were seeking the office of U.S. Senator, I would like to have the support of the Governor, and I would like to be on the ticket with him. In most instances it would be desirable to have action taken in accordance with the Governor's desires, I would think.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Under the convention system there would not be the opportunity for the public to participate that there would be under the primary system.

I concede that many people who qualify for election to office have no business qualifying to begin with.

Mr. KEATING. Yes, under any system; it is impossible to devise a system to protect against that situation.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. But it seems to me that it would be desirable for a candidate to offer himself for selection under the primary system.

Mr. KEATING. I think it is open to anyone in the State of New York, just as it is in the State of Louisiana, which has primaries. It is open to anyone to offer himself for office, for the Senate or any other office. Such candidates are not even required to put up any money. They can just say, "I am a candidate." If they can get a majority of the delegates to support them, they are in the clear.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Could the Senator inform me as to whether in many instances there is any great cost incident to being selected under a convention system? Do candidates spend a lot of money for the selection, or is the cost nominal?

Mr. KEATING. I would say the cost is normally less than that in a primary. If a person is an avowed candidate for the nomination of his party for the U.S. Senate, let us say—and parenthetically I should say I am not speaking of candidates for Members of the House of Representatives; I am speaking now of only candidates in New York for the Senate who are selected by convention—and if a number are seeking that nomination, they must spend substantial amounts of money in seeking support. I would say, in all fairness, that, generally speaking, the amount spent would be less than what would be spent in a primary.

I personally think that the decision as to whether nominees should be selected by primary or convention or caucus, or whatever other manner, is something which the State legislatures should decide, rather than Congress. I feel that the bill which is before the Senate, Mr. President, would be sadly deficient if each procedure for picking candidates were not covered by what we are calling here, or what has been called, a clean elections bill.

I should like to point out also that this amendment is pertinent and important for those States where nomination does not mean automatic victory on election day. Congress has just as firm an obligation to fix the guidelines and prescribe the limitations on the manner in which nominees for Federal office are picked in those States as in those jurisdictions where nomination means election.

In other words, if we are going to set forth limitations on the process of selecting candidates for President, Vice President, U.S. Senator, or Representative, we should not do a halfway job. The law must apply to the whole electoral process, and it must apply to the so-called one-party and the so-called two-party States.

Whether nomination of a Federal candidate means he is a "shoo-in" on election day or means he must then face a campaign against the opponent of another political party—such as described by my friend from Louisiana, with, I am afraid, a certain exaggerated degree of hyperbole—we have an obligation to set up certain rules and regulations about the manner in which each is selected. Abuse of power or misuse of funds in primary, caucus, or convention of either party weakens the whole structure of the electoral process.

If we are going to call this a clean elections bill—and that is the phrase having such wide circulation—we should make it worthy of the name. A half-hearted job will not do. Only by including within its purview primaries, caucuses, and conventions can we achieve a goal of fairness and equity in choosing federally elected officers.

I would remind the distinguished Senator from Louisiana and other Senators who oppose this amendment that the concept of States rights is a many-splendored thing. However, he would seem to wish to make it a many-splintered thing, particularly in the case of the State of New York. It happens that New York is a politically spacious State, where we have ample room for differences of opinion. The primary, we feel, is not the sole and sacred way of forming or recording that difference of opinion, and I think New York, just as should Louisiana, should have the decision in the matter.

In New York, nominating conventions are the avenues of selection, and they are broad thoroughfares open to those with conflicting opinions. They are not one-way streets that lead unfailingly to victory.

I can testify to that most persuasively, Mr. President. In New York, to be nominated for Congress means only that one gets to play in the big November game. In Louisiana, if one is nominated on the ticket of the Senator from Louisiana, it means that he has already won the game and he can already start wearing his varsity letter. So there is that difference between the two States.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, I know the Senator really believes that; otherwise, he would not say it. But let me tell the Senator that whenever a popular Republican candidate for President heads the ticket which carries the Senator's State, if one is running for the House or the Senate in my State, he would be unwise to take his election as a foregone conclusion. The junior Senator from Louisiana recalls that in a presidential election some years back, the Republican opponent got 25 or 26 percent of the votes.

Mr. KEATING. That is amazing.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. His Democratic opponent in the following election got 29 percent, which was not a lot more than the Republican opponent had received. That being the case, it would seem that one should be cautious. In fact, I would caution against a person's believing that the citizens of Southern States are above voting for Republican candidates.

Mr. KEATING. The Senator means below, does he not?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. The junior Senator from Louisiana had assured his little daughter in the last presidential election, that although President Eisenhower would carry the Nation, he would not carry Louisiana. She could not understand, the next day, how her father could have been wrong. I had to tell her there was no doubt that was what happened. I was satisfied President Eisenhower had carried Louisiana, and by about 40,000 votes.

Mr. KEATING. But no Republican candidate for the Senate or the House was elected from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. There were few running on the ballot that same day. Every now and then a good Republican candidate comes along and gets a very respectable vote.

Mr. KEATING. I do not want to embarrass my friend by asking who a good Republican candidate would be in Louisiana. I am very glad President Eisenhower carried Louisiana. I hope the next candidate from my party will be strong enough to carry Louisiana.

I think the junior Senator from Louisiana will not be a candidate in 1960. Is that correct?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. That is correct.

Mr. KEATING. Well, then, I would hope that some of the candidates for Congress from Louisiana will be elected from the Republican ticket. It would be a very healthy thing, in my judgment. Undoubtedly my friend will differ with me, but, in general parlance, I think Louisiana is generally considered a one-party State, and all of the Representatives in Congress now are Members of the Senator's party. We hope that may be changed in the future.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I would like to recommend that there be no change in the present Louisiana delegation. I think the State is very well represented at this time. But some of the Members of Congress from that State can point out to the Senator that they have had very serious opposition from Republican candidates in recent years; I would say in the last 4 or 5 years.

Mr. KEATING. I appreciate the illumination from the distinguished Senator from Louisiana, but I must impress upon him, in the light of some of the statements which he made about the procedures in the State of New York, that the candidates for the Senate in that State may come from smoke-filled rooms or non-smoke-filled rooms, but that is only a point of departure. Those candidates must then be nominated actually in convention. They must after that stalk like hopeful gladiators into the area of popular selection. Their victory or defeat is at the whim—in New York, of course, the educated and informed whim—of the convention delegates. These delegates who select the candidates did not wander in accidentally, nor were they culled like flowers all of one party shade and one party aroma. They are literally the voices of the constituents.

I can assure the Senator that whether it be a Democratic or Republican convention, the unanimity of delegates, or close to unanimity, is music to the ears of the man who has to fight his way into an election, rather than shadow box his way there.

To the argument that primaries are outside the scope of our legitimate interest, I draw attention to the genesis of the Hatch Act, a most significant and far-reaching piece of legislation which, according to its history, seems to have been born out of a primary contest between two of our former colleagues, Alben Barkley and Gov. A. B. "Happy" Chandler of Kentucky.

According to the allegations, we had the situation of a massed battle in the great heroic tradition, with Federal employees on the Barkley firing line, according to Mr. Chandler, and the Chandler minutemen of State employees, striking and sparring for their Governor, by the claim of Mr. Barkley.

I do not seek to pass upon the merits of those claims, but I am informed that this was the great confrontation which gave rise to the writing of the Hatch Act, so that we are on firm historical ground, buttressed by a sound precedent, in this attempt to create legislation which is responsive to actual conditions rather than to traditional emotions.

It seems that during June of 1938 a series of articles dealing extensively with conditions in the Kentucky primary, written by one of the staff writers for a prominent press association, was published. In these articles the writer alleged that undue political activities in the WPA in Kentucky had taken place on behalf of Senator Barkley, the candidate in that primary for the Democratic nomination to the U.S. Senate.

A press release containing a résumé of all these charges—22 of them in all—prepared in the form of individual paragraphs and a reply to each, by Mr. Harry Hopkins, was issued by the WPA in Washington, June 30, 1938.

The dates of all of these events in 1938 are significant in the light of what I shall come to in a moment. Mr. Hopkins denied all but two of these charges, admitting the correctness of these two.

In July of 1938 the committee decided to send a representative to Kentucky in connection with these charges and the replies by Mr. Hopkins. The committee's representative and the staff assisting him, after investigation, made a report sustaining the staff writer in a majority of the charges, and concurring with Mr. Hopkins in four instances. The findings of the committee's investigator in reference to these charges indicated solicitation of WPA employees and officials for contributions to the campaign funds of candidate Barkley and a systematic canvassing of WPA employees as to preference in the race for the Democratic senatorial nomination. These activities, so far as solicitations were concerned, were carried on mainly by private parties not connected with the WPA but in some instances by WPA officials.

While the committee's investigator was in Kentucky, charges came to his attention regarding the solicitation and receipt by the campaign committee of Governor Chandler, candidate for the Democratic senatorial nomination, of contributions in behalf of his campaign from State employees whose salaries were derived partly or wholly from Federal funds. Certain other charges were presented to the committee's investigator while in Kentucky relative to the solicitation by private citizens of Federal employees in behalf of the campaign committees for candidate Barkley.

The committee sustained many of these charges. The committee sustained the charge that the campaign committee of candidate Chandler received contributions as the result of solicitations for contributions from State employees who were receiving salaries from funds derived wholly or in part from the Treasury of the United States. The findings of the committee, based on the evidence before it, showed that the amount received for Governor Chandler's campaign, from State employees whose salaries had been partly or wholly derived from funds paid by the Federal Government, was roughly $70,000.

The findings of the committee, based on the evidence before it, also showed that subscriptions intended for candidate Barkley's campaign committees were made not only by employees of the WPA in Kentucky, but also by employees in this State of the National Bituminous Coal Commission, the Bureau of Internal Revenue, the Bureau of Accounts of the Treasury Department, the Home Owners Loan Corporation, and the Federal Housing Administration, amounting to about $24,000 in all. In other words, the committee sustained in part the charges of both of these candidates.

I wish to emphasize at this point that in a later part of the report about the matter the committee did have more to say, lest there be any misunderstanding. Again I reiterate that the merits of this controversy are not so important as the precedent which it created.

In response to questionnaires of the Sheppard committee, Senator Barkley stated that he had not used any public funds or political patronage in behalf of his campaign for nomination or election to the Senate, and that no public funds or political patronage had been used to his knowledge by others in behalf of his nomination or election to the Senate. In fact, the committee found nothing to show that Senator Barkley had any knowledge of any activity by persons soliciting contributions from Federal employees in his behalf, or of political activity within the ranks of the WPA personnel in his interests. The committee found, therefore, no basis upon which to recommend any challenge to the right of Senator Barkley to take the seat to which he had been elected.

In January 1939 the Sheppard Committee To Investigate Senatorial Campaign Expenditures and Use of Governmental Funds reported that sufficient misuse of Federal relief funds had been shown to prompt them to make certain recommendations. On the next day after the Sheppard committee had reported, Senator Hatch introduced two bills, which he later incorporated into a single bill, introduced on March 20, 1939. This bill subsequently was enacted and became known as the Hatch Act. In other words, the entire history of that transaction shows that the genesis of the Hatch Act, which bars political activity by Federal employees, arose out of a primary contest. Certainly there is legislative precedent for the contention that the Congress is and should be as much concerned with primary elections of Federal officials as with general elections.

I served in the House of Representatives for several sessions on the committee appointed every 2 years, known as the Committee on Campaign Expenditures, which is a slight misnomer. Actually we usually did not investigate expenditures so much as various irregularities charged by one side or the other in a campaign. A number of our hearings and the evidence we took all over the country in various years as the result of allegations of irregularities had to do with primaries.

I remember very well an investigation which we made in North Carolina, with respect to which I shall not go into detail now; but there was no question that our jurisdiction over primaries was accepted by everyone, and there is a clear basis for the action.

Mr. President, power of Congress to regulate elections has been compared, in some of the precedents, to the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce. There are some incidents of interstate commerce over which, of course, the Congress has plenary control—for example, when the subject matter is one of national interest, requiring a uniform rule. This means, for example, that Congress could require that all interstate trains comply with certain safety regulations, but it does not mean that Congress could compel a trucking company to go into the railroad business. That is the basic distinction between the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] to the Hennings-Keating amendment, and the Hennings-Keating amendment itself.

If the States wish to stay out of the primary field, that is their right, and no act of Congress can properly alter that situation. But if the Congress decides that candidates in a primary for election to the Senate or the House shall disclose where their campaign contributions come from, and the amount of them, and that they shall not exceed a certain amount, certainly Congress has the power to do so.

Despite the concession by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] that in his opinion Congress does have a constitutional power to legislate in this field, his feeling being that Congress should not do so, there is a body of opinion—judging from some discussions in the cloakrooms and elsewhere—which raises the question as to whether or not Congress can constitutionally act in this field. I wish to address myself briefly to that argument.

The argument that the Federal Corrupt Practices Act cannot constitutionally be made applicable to primary elections is contrary to reason and precedent. Whatever doubt there may have once been on this issue has been laid to rest by a line of Supreme Court decisions starting in 1941 recognizing that the selection of candidates for Federal office is an integral part of the elections process and is subject to Federal limitations. I must say that any other rule would make a mockery of regulation in the large number of States in which the primary determines the outcome of the election, and in all States in which candidates are chosen by vote would ignore a vital part of the election process. Can anyone doubt that corruption in a primary contest can impair the integrity of the election itself and undermine the free choice of the electorate?

The power of Congress to legislate on this subject derives primarily from the provisions of article 1, section 2, of the Constitution, which provides:

> The House of Representatives shall be composed of Members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature.

Article I, section 4, of the Constitution provides:

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

Article I, section 8, clause 18, of the Constitution provides that the Congress shall have the power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or office thereof.

These sections have been described as an arsenal of power ample to protect congressional elections from any and all forms of pollution. If they are not broad enough to deal with integral steps in the election process, then the Constitution itself is inadequate to the task. Happily, the courts have not found such a defect in our fundamental law.

The leading case in point is United States v. Classic (313 U.S. 299 (1941). In that case, the Supreme Court upheld an indictment against the commissioners of elections in the great State of Louisiana which charged that they willfully altered and falsely counted the ballots cast in a primary election to nominate a candidate of the Democratic Party for Representative in Congress. I might add that in 1941 our distinguished friend from Louisiana was virtually in knickers. I am just stating a historical precedent. It happened to be in Louisiana. We have had violations of law in the State of New York, also. The Court pointed out that in Louisiana interference with the right to vote in the Democratic primary is an interference with the effective choice of the voters at the only stage of the election procedure when their choice is of significance. Such interference, the Court held, could be constitutionally proscribed by the Congress.

The majority opinion by Mr. Justice Stone in the Classic case answers virtually every argument that has been raised. I highly commend it to any of my colleagues who have even the slightest doubt on the legal merits of the amendment proposed. Let me quote just a few short passages from the opinion to demonstrate how directly and eloquently it covers the subject:

That the free choice by the people of representatives in Congress was one of the great purposes of our constitutional scheme of government cannot be doubted. We cannot regard it as any the less the constitutional purpose, or its words as any the less guaranteeing the integrity of that choice, when a State, exercising its privileges in the absence of congressional action, changes the mode of choice from a single step, a general election, to two, of which the first is the choice at a primary of those candidates from whom, as a second step, the representative in Congress is to be chosen at the election.

Or let us consider this passage:

Nor can we say that that choice which the Constitution protects is restricted to the second step because section 4 of article I, as a means of securing a free choice of representative by the people has authorized Congress to regulate the manner of elections, without making any mention of primary elections. For we think that the authority of Congress, given by section 4 includes the authority to regulate primary elections when, as in this case, they are a step in the exercise by the people of their choice of representatives in Congress.

Or finally:

It is hardly the performance of the judicial function to construe a statute, which in terms protects a right secured by the Constitution, here the right to choose a representative in Congress, as applying to an election whose only function is to ratify a choice already made at the primary, but as having no application to the primary which is the only effective means of choice.

To these decisions and to these quotations I say "amen." Let us not be so foolish as to make the mistake the judges avoided. We have got to come to grips with the facts and not be misled by fanciful theories and unreal distinctions. This bill does not deserve to be called "a clean elections bill" as long as it leaves the primaries unscrubbed.

Back in 1957 the committee of which my distinguished friend from Missouri is now chairman and was chairman then, reported a bill to the Senate which included primaries. That bill was never scheduled for action, but in the report accompanying the bill the committee pointed out that under some of the other precedents which at present to a significant degree regulate primaries, the law prohibits national banks, corporations, and labor organizations making contributions or making expenditures in connection with the election of any Federal candidate. The committee said:

The language of this statute explicitly includes primary elections and political conventions and caucuses. Again, the prohibition of individual campaign contributions in excess of $5,000 for a candidate or political committee during 1 calendar year comprises not only elections but also nominations. Finally, the general language of these statutes which prohibits a Member of Congress from soliciting or accepting money from Federal employees carries the strong implication at least that primaries are within the purview of this prohibition, and this broad interpretation was adopted by the Supreme Court of the United States in U.S. v. Wurzbach, in 280 U.S.

The Taft-Hartley Act is a direct legislative precedent for regulating political expenditures "in connection with any primary election or political convention or caucus."

Certainly those who have laid down this provision in the Taft-Hartley Act for one segment of our economy cannot be heard to say that the Congress of the United States is not interested in the conduct of primary elections, or that some different rule shall apply where some other situation is presented.

The committees of Congress charged with the function have never hesitated to inquire into irregularities in primaries, as I mentioned a moment ago, as well as in the general election, in judging the qualifications of Members under challenge.

As I indicated earlier, the Classic case has been consistently followed in a host of cases involving discrimination or inequality in primary elections; cases such as Smith v. Allwright, 321 U.S. 649 (1944); Chapman v. King, 154 F. 2d 460 (5th Cir. 1946), cert. denied, 327 U.S. 800 (1946); and Terry v. Adams, 345 U.S. 461 (1953).

The law on this subject is well settled. It is plain to see for anyone who does not view the matter through a clouded looking glass. Law and reason combine in this situation to make an overwhelming case for approval of this amendment.

Mr. President, I believe that the pending bill is one of the most important pieces of legislation which is likely to come before us at this session. I am really dismayed at the apparent public apathy concerning the bill. We know that everyone wants clean elections. However, many people apparently are indifferent to the great opportunity which this measure represents to help achieve that goal.

Of course, there is not anything we do here in a legislative way which is going to be perfect or going to take care of every situation.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEATING. I am happy to yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. HENNINGS. I am glad the Senator made the observation that this will not be perfect legislation, if it is adopted, even if it is amended to the ultimate extent that some of us would like to see it amended.

I would say to my distinguished colleague that it cannot be emphasized too strongly that this is probably the last time for many years that a bill will be available to this body which will attempt to do anything about the election process and the regulation and the reporting of contributions.

I am especially pleased that the Senator has made a scholarly approach to this matter in a lawyerlike fashion in referring to the Classic case, which utterly demolishes any contention that legislation relating to primary contributions in reporting is unconstitutional or that primaries are not a part of the election process.

We know that things do happen in primaries, as they happen in general elections, of which the public has the right to possess full knowledge. I think the Senator from New York will agree that it will be a shameful thing if the U.S. Senate goes on record by telling the American people that we do not think they should know anything about contributions and their sources and amounts in primary elections.

We like to go about the world setting ourselves up and holding ourselves up before others as having a standard of government and a form of government under a free electorate; as being governed by the people in democratic elections, under a republican form of government; and still we ourselves, right here, in what so many people think of and describe as the greatest deliberative body in the world, do nothing about this matter, and let it go by default, either through indifference or through failure to face up to the facts of life.

Contributions are something to which the public has every right to know about. The courts have so held and, as the Senator from New York has pointed out, there are innumerable precedents in the Senate itself, when the Senate has taken jurisdiction of primary election contests. Those precedents would seem to demolish effectively any argument on that point, unless there are matters of policy involved, which is an entirely different thing. Certainly on the legal and constitutional basis, there is no other side.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I appreciate those remarks of the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee. I do not see how anyone who votes against this amendment can explain his action. Of course, it is not up to me to try to explain someone else's vote; I am answerable only to my own conscience, as is the Senator from Missouri to his. But I agree with him that the people of the United States want to have the bill apply just as much to primaries as it does to general elections. Of that I am sure. I am sure that is true of the people in every State of the Union, not only in the State which I have the honor to represent, in part. If there is to be an election law, the people want it to apply across the board; they want to have it apply to any part of the election process where funds are used.

But I am rather concerned that there has been relatively little public response. My mail has been very light on this subject. I do not speak for other Senators, but I feel that if the people of the country understood this issue, they would back this amendment. A number of newspapers have backed the general effort to modernize our outdated election laws. The Senator from Missouri referred in his remarks today to a very splendid editorial published in the New York Times, a newspaper which has spoken out vigorously in support of the bill and in support of the amendment to include primaries. Those are sound words. They come also from other great newspapers of the Nation. I know of no newspaper which has campaigned against the bill or, indeed, against the inclusion of primary elections in the bill. There may have been some, but I have not learned of them; they have not come to my attention. I hope that such support of the general principles of the bill will be heeded when this measure and the amendment come to a vote.

Some of the provisions of the bill can be improved upon; but, by and large, the bill represents a very fine attempt to make this statute more realistic and in tune with the costs and practices of modern political campaigns. It is a giant stride in the right direction and, therefore, deserves the support of all those who believe in sound and practical legislation to improve the Federal electoral processes.

The Senator from Missouri is dead right when he says that now is the time to act. The hour has struck. If this amendment is not adopted and the bill is not passed at this time, there will not be another opportunity for a good many years. The Senator from Missouri reported a bill on this subject 2 years ago. It included primaries, as he pointed out a few minutes ago. But it was never acted upon. It was never scheduled for action. If we do not act now, we will not have another chance for a long time to come.

Mr. President, the issue is so clear and, it seems to me, so fundamental, that I do not see how there can be any opposition. Usually I can see the merit of the other side of an argument. I have sometimes bent over backward to do so. Perhaps an error or a fault of mine is seeing too much merit on the other side. But in this case I cannot understand how one can be in favor of the general principle of improving the Federal electoral machinery by enacting the bill, and then say that he will vote to leave out of it one of the most fundamental steps in the process of choosing a candidate for the Senate or House. The people, I am satisfied, want to know who spends the money to elect their candidates in a primary or a general election. They are entitled to know. We should respond to them by adopting the amendment.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I enthusiastically support the amendment. I think it goes to the very heart of the political process. It is vital that the electorate have the fullest possible knowledge of the money which is spent in campaigns, not only in general election campaigns, but in primary election campaigns, as well.

On the basis of the individual views expressed in the committee report, both the chairman of the committee, the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS], and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], and also by the Republican Members of the committee, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. MORTON], and the Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING], that the constitutional issue has been made crystal clear. I have not heard it challenged. I have been looking for enlightenment from the other side, so as to meet such a challenge. But I have been looking in vain for a substantial argument.

It has been emphasized that the case of United States against Classic, in 1941, touches very directly on this point. There is no question about it. The Supreme Court has spoken out. Perhaps even more persuasive with Congress is the Taft-Hartley Act of 1947, which prohibits unions, corporations, or banks from expending money in a primary election, a convention, or a caucus. If that is not Federal regulation of primary elections, I do not know what it is. It seems to me that the precedent is clear, just as the constitutional issue is absolutely clear.

The issue is simply a matter of disclosure. I do not think anyone in the Senate has done a more consistent, a more effective, a more commendable job of championing the public's right to know than has the great chairman of the Committee on Rules and Administration, the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS]. His position on this amendment is certainly in keeping with the fight he has made over the years for the right of the newspapers to print the facts and the public to know the facts.

The only argument which can be made in opposition to disclosure is that this information is not any of the public's business. How can such an argument be made? It seems to me that if there is anything which is the public's business, it is to have a full and complete knowledge of the money which is being spent in elections. Every American citizen knows that a primary contest is as much an election, in every sense, as is a general election.

There has been a great deal of talk and there have been many changes to the effect that a great deal af labor money has been used in elections. Some have charged that oil money has been used heavily in elections, or that the executives of large banks have tried to get their friends elected to office by heavy contributions.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield briefly?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEATING in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I am glad to yield to the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Rules and Administration.

Mr. HENNINGS. First, Mr. President, I wish to thank my friend, the able and diligent junior Senator from Wisconsin, for his very kind words of commendation of the efforts of some of us in connection with bringing this proposed legislation before the Senate, and also for his recognition of the many years of work and effort to adjust and accommodate disparate views and views lacking in harmony, in order to report to the Senate some bill on this subject.

As I am sure the Senator from Wisconsin knows, the bill was reported to the Senater after I had offered, in the committee, amendments which I have proposed to offer here in the Chamber. One of those amendments has already been offered thus far during the consideration of the bill in the Senate.

I think the observation of the Senator from Wisconsin in regard to the Taft-Hartley Act is especially important. I undertook to mention that point several days ago, and I am very glad the Senator from Wisconsin has emphasized it.

We have not heard any hue or cry about Federal intervention in States by the Taft-Hartley Act, which relates to contributions made by labor unions and corporations. Yet we find, for some reason or other, a disposition to set ourselves up in the guise of being the judges of what the public has a right to know about what we do in order to be elected to membership in this body, to represent them.

Not only is it hypocrisy, Mr. President, but it also seems to me that it is an evasion of direct public duty and responsibility, if we say that these things are not in the public domain and do not become, by their very nature, essential parts of the public business.

I thank the Senator from Wisconsin very much for his references and for his contributions thus far.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I thank the distinguished Senator from Missouri.

Mr. President, when the Senator from Missouri said, in the course of his remarks, that the public has a right to know about what we Senators do, I believe he put his finger on what is the natural, human, understandable objection to this proposed legislation. It is too bad that that has to be the situation; but, after all, legislators are human, and the Senate and the House of Representatives are human institutions.

It is always difficult for any group of people to act in such ways that they circumscribe their own conduct. However, it seems to me that this is exactly what should be done. I believe that anyone who is able to stand to one side and take an objective view of this situation must be persuaded that what we now propose is the right thing to do, and that the public has every bit as much right to know about the amounts of money spent in primary elections of U.S. Senators and Members of the House of Representatives as the public has a right to know how the executive agencies function, or as the public has a right to know about any other matter of public business.

It seems to me that the only consistently defensible position which can be taken against the public's right to know is in connection with military or diplomatic action by the Government. However, I do not believe anyone can properly argue that a general election or a primary election has anything to do with the military or diplomatic activity of the Federal Government. No sound case can possibly be made for a contention that the interests of the American people, the interests of the Nation, the interests of the Government, or the interests of any person, can be seriously damaged by letting the public know the facts of these situations.

Mr. President, I should like to dwell briefly on the nature of the vote. We take pride in the fact that we leave it up to the people of the country to decide who shall be the nominees of the respective parties. But do we really leave it up to the people to decide, if they do not have sufficient information when they are voting?

When either a Senator or any other citizen goes to vote in a regular election, it seems to me that the quality of his vote is extremely important. If people vote in ignorance, if they do not have the facts, if they are not informed, we cannot correctly say that democracy has had a chance to speak or that the people have had a real opportunity to make a proper determination.

I believe it perfectly obvious that the amount of money contributed in connection with primary elections preceding the general congressional elections is of most vital importance in connection with the determination of whether certain candidates merit support. Certainly the people have a right to know whether persons with an ax to grind or with legislation to support or oppose are contributing very heavily to the campaigns of various candidates. The people have a right to examine those facts and the record of the candidates.

For instance, I have received campaign contributions from both business groups and labor groups, and I am very proud that I have. In fact, if I had not received those contributions, undoubtedly I would not have been elected; and I believe the same is true of all other Members of the Senate.

Certainly, the people also have a right to know what my record has been, on the basis of who my financial supporters are and who they have been. If the people do not have that information, their votes will not be informed ones; and then we shall be depriving them of the right to cast informed votes. It seems to me that then the whole process of democracy is directly and seriously weakened.

That is why I believe the proposal of the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS], which he has submitted on behalf of himself and the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING], goes to the very heart of the political process.

Mr. President, basically we are dealing with a most delicate subject which is difficult to discuss, not only because it directly affects the election of U.S. Senators, who themselves have to make the decision in this instance, but also because it affects the very delicate issue of political power. I believe that all of us recognize that the expenditure of money is necessary in order to conduct a modern campaign. All of us recognize, I believe, that democracy has been greatly aided by the participation of those who can have their campaigns financed in ways which enable them to have their messages reach the people. The television, the radio, and the newspapers perform a very vital, important, necessary, and desirable political function when they carry to the people of the country political speeches and messages.

There is nothing wrong with it. But it is clear that the public has a right to know where the money is coming from, evaluate the record of candidates who run for office, consider the amount of money that is being spent, put it in some proportion, and, on the basis of information the public has, come to a conclusion and cast a vote that is informed, and informed on the realities of political life.

The Senator from Missouri and the Senator from New York have both pointed out that this bill makes a real effort to diminish the burden of reporting in elections. This is not a bill that provides that candidates for Congress and their committees should do more work. This is a bill which, on the contrary, provides, as I understand it, a situation in which Senators and their committees and Representatives and their committees and their staffs would do less work. The reporting work is substantially lessened. It would not be significantly increased if primary campaigns also were subject to reporting.

Mr. President, I suppose it is not always wise to discuss all aspects of these issues, but I do not see how I can make a meaningful presentation of what I think of the issues without discussing the fact that we have in a large part of the country—and it directly affects my own party—a one-party system. We have a political system in the South in which the general election is meaningless. For many, many years—for generations—only one party has determined who is going to sit in the U.S. Senate and in the House of Representatives, and, indeed, generally, who is going to receive the electoral votes for the Presidency of the United States.

Under those circumstances it is just incredible that the Congress of the United States should permit one-fourth of our Nation, in effect, to have no requirement whatsoever for disclosure of campaign contributions, no opportunity for the public in the South to know who is contributing to an election and who is not.

It is true that some of those States have adequate reporting laws. But the States have no responsibility. One might even say they have no business determining the qualifications of the candidates for Federal office.

The Constitution is very explicit and clear on that point, and the cases are abundant on it. It is up to the Senate of the United States to judge the qualifications of its Members. We had a celebrated case in my own State, in which the supreme court of my State set forth that, although a candidate seemed to have disqualified himself on the basis of his conduct, the Supreme Court of the State of Wisconsin had no right to pass on it, because the Constitution provided that the U.S. Senate alone shall be the judge of the qualifications of its Members.

Under those circumstances, the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States are going to take the position that they have no right to inquire into and regulate the primary election process and require reports to be made to the public. What we are doing it depriving the public of an opportunity to know who is making contributions in an election—the only election in which the people in one-fourth of the Nation have a real opportunity to determine who is going to represent them in the U.S. Senate and House of Representatives.

The Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING], in his very excellent speech, asked that those who were voting against this amendment attempt to explain their vote. He pointed out that there had been very little publicity on this amendment, very little public outcry, and very little mail. I suppose that is because those who oppose the amendment have made no attempt to answer the arguments, because, from the standpoint of the public, there is only one answer, that is a vote of ringing support for the Hennings amendment.

I conclude, Mr. President, by saying that I feel we indeed should have a clean elections bill. I think it is a very happy title for the bill. But it ought to be a really clean elections bill for the United States of America, for all 50 States, for all sections of our country, and for all elections. I feel we ought to have a clean primary elections bill, just as we have a clean national elections bill.

Mr. President, I think the case for this amendment is simply overwhelming. I am very proud and happy to support it.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I am glad to be recognized immediately following the very fine speech of my colleague from Wisconsin, because I should like to take up where he left off. I was a member of the Committee on Rules and Administration and helped to draft the bill, which got nowhere in the Senate. I congratulate the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Missouri, for getting this bill called up so early in the session.

I should like to state the issue, taking up from where my friend from Wisconsin left off, as I see it. The issue, as I see it, is, Shall we have a clean elections bill or shall we have a partial clean elections bill? This is what the question really comes down to. Shall we have a bill that relates to some of the States and not to other States, or shall we have a bill that relates to all the States, where the people who decide who is going to be their Senator or Representative or President or Vice President in the primary or general elections? Because, as my friend from Wisconsin has truly said, in a very large number of States the primary decides the election. Indeed, an analysis of the individual number of citizens who vote shows that in a majority of the cases a much larger number of votes is cast in primary elections than in the general elections. In those very Southern States, a minor percentage of the vote cast in the primary—in some cases a ridiculously small portion of the vote cast in the primary—is cast in the general election. Hence, it would be a mockery for the election process to pass a clean election bill without including the primaries.

We would not be reaching what is substantially the election in many of our States.

Mr. President, the interesting thing is how we sometimes debate in a vacuum, because they have just had a hot primary election for Governor in Louisiana between Mayor deLesseps Morrison of New Orleans, and a man named Jim Davis. This primary took place in one of the largest and most important States of the Union, and the primary election was decided in favor of Mr. Davis after not only the originally primary election, but after a runoff primary election. Does anyone in this Chamber or in the United States doubt that Mr. Davis will be elected Governor of Louisiana? Will many citizens of Louisiana trouble to go to the polls and vote in the general election? Probably not, if history continues in the future as it has in the past, as it undoubtedly will. Who is going to put up money for a candidate in opposition? Everyone knows the election has already been decided. So it would be a mockery to pass this bill to control contributions to campaigns in the general elections which is absolutely meaningless to the people of the State of Louisana and to other States of the Union. Indeed, I think if my colleague from Missouri did not proposed this amendment, he would be derelict in his duty, he would be misleading, he would be advocating a clean elections bill which was applicable to only certain sections of the country. I know him too well and love him too much to believe anything like that from him.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. HENNINGS. I am most grateful to my friend from New York. He is an able lawyer. He is a former attorney general of the State of New York He had been a diligent member of the Committee on Rules and Administration, of which I happen to be chairman.

The Senator is one to whom we listen when matters relating to constitutional law, or indeed all law, are involved in the processes of the Senate.

May I ask my friend from New York, whose remarks I very much appreciate and whose support we indeed welcome, how he would view any suggestion that an attempt to regulate primaries is unconstitutional, or that an attempt to regulate contributions in primaries is unconstitutional, in view of the Classic case, with which the Senator is doubtless familiar, and in view of the precedents of the Senate, taking further into consideration the Taft-Hartley Act and the contributions by labor unions in primaries and general elections?

Mr. JAVITS. I do not think there is any question, Mr. President, about the fact that legislation made applicable to primaries is absolutely constitutional.

I should like to go further and point out that unless we do what we should do in this regard we hardly shall be honest with ourselves, because we passed in 1957 a so-called civil rights bill to deal with elections in far greater particularity than even the primaries.

Mr. President, one of the things which also makes me feel we live in a dream world here so very often is that nobody has talked about the fact that this is really the opening round, the challenge round to the whole question of whether we will or will not effectively protect the right to vote in this country. Mr. Presiden, if we find ourselves inhibited on legal grounds from passing legislation to determine whether there shall be public attention drawn to whoever contributes to a primary campaign, how are we going to deal with the elementary question of what to do in a State where the State officials absolutely defy the mandate of the Constitution that every citizen is entitled to vote by refusing or by failing to register the citizen or by effectively barring him from registering as a voter?

Of course, Mr. President, everybody understands that.

Mr. HENNINGS. I will say to the distinguished Senator, we are holding hearings, which commenced this morning, with regard to the recommendations of the Civil Rights Commission relating to temporary Federal registrars. This morning we heard a former president of the American Bar Association, a former dean of the Southern Methodist University, now a practitioner of law in Dallas, Tex., who strongly supported and advocated the appointment of Federal registrars, even though he is a southerner born and bred. He advocated the appointment of registrars in certain States where the right to vote is denied to citizens otherwise qualified.

Because I know of the Senator's broad interest in this question—our mutual interest in it—I thought he would be glad to know of that testimony. I believe we shall hear from the Senator tomorrow.

Mr. JAVITS. That is correct. I shall testify tomorrow.

Mr. HENNINGS. We look forward to hearing the Senator's testimony.

Mr. JAVITS. I have just completed preparing my testimony.

The important thing, Mr. President, is that again we live in a dream world, because nobody talks about the facts that what we do in regard to this bill is directly connected with what we shall do in regard to the other and very basic proposed legislation which we are assured will come before us in the middle of February, as to which the committee headed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] is now engaged in what I consider to be a great exercise of responsibility, the holding of hearings.

Mr. President, only a few days ago the Attorney General of the United States argued in the Supreme Court a case which relates to this very critical question which is before us now, for a lower court had held the Civil Rights Act of 1957 unconstitutional, stating that the act was beyond the power of the Congress. The Attorney General was in the Supreme Court arguing it was well within the power of Congress and was very constitutional, because of the very arguments which we are making here, that the Congress has the right to deal with Federal elections in order to be sure that every citizen may vote.

Mr. President, only a few days ago a judge in the Federal court in Louisiana, acting under the Civil Rights Act of 1957, ordered restored to the voting rolls 1,377 Negroes in a Louisiana parish.

Mr. President, what we are told by those who propose that we should defeat this amendment to include primaries in the bill is, in practical effect, that we have no right to know by what processes people are financed in order to get voters either on or off the voting rolls. This is a question of a primary election, not a question of a general election.

It seems to me that to implement the law which we passed by a heavy majority in 1957 it is absolutely essential to include primary elections under the coverage of the bill.

Mr. President, I emphasize the aspects of this matter which relate to the whole struggle to give American citizens the opportunity to vote, because I think this is very much a part of that struggle. An opportunity to vote effectively may be denied by the conditions which surround primary elections, by the amounts of money poured into them, by the sources from which the money comes, or by other conditions which relate to the election.

Mr. President, there has been a lot of talk about money, and money is a very important thing, but the bill by no means confines itself only to the question of who shall contribute money. If we pass the amendment, we shall make the whole bill—not simply that part of it relating to the reporting of contributions—applicable to primary elections.

In the first place, we shall make applicable that part of the law which, for the first time, makes realistic provision in regard to what it costs to run a primary election in one of these States where the primary election winner takes all, instead of the "mumbo-jumbo" we have been going through for years and years and years because of an archaic law, with the proliferation of many committees in order to be able to run a campaign at all, as we all know.

Mr. President, it seems to me we ought to be as honest about primary elections in that regard as we are about general elections.

Even a simple provision like that contained in the bill which would prevent anybody from making a contribution except in his own proper name, so that the people may know exactly who is contributing, ought to be applied in the primary elections.

Finally, there are regulations with relation to the so-called equal-time rule as to political broadcasts. That is certainly as applicable to primary elections as it is to general elections, and the rules on that subject should be uniform.

The same is true with respect to other phases of the law.

Mr. President, it seems to me the very key to the issue posed before us is this: Shall we pass a clean elections bill which discriminates against some States of the Union in favor of the States of the Union which decide their elections, for all practical purposes, in the primaries, or shall we not?

Shall we pass a clean elections bill which, whatever may be the approach of a particular State as to deciding who shall be the highest officials, will apply exactly the same standards to all States?

It seems to me, Mr. President, that the mere framing of the question dictates the answer.

Those of us who will go out to tell our constituents that we voted for a clean elections bill, to reform the elections procedures of the country, in one and the same breath will have to tell our constituents that we were honest enough to make it applicable to all elections in which the question of who will be the Representative in Congress or the Senator, in national elections, is finally decided. In a very large number of States in the United States the question is finally decided in the primary.

Mr. President, I deeply believe there is no alternative other than to adopt the amendment recommended by our colleague from Missouri and by my own junior colleague from New York.

Mr. President, while I am on my feet I should like to say a few words about the bill itself. As I have said, when I was a member of the committee I had some hand in drafting the predecesor bill, which, incidentally, when it came to the Senate, also covered the primary elections. This bill marks a departure from a situation which I hope very much we shall correct.

Lest anyone think this bill is going too far too fast, I point out that this is an extremely modest bill, doing nothing, really, but bringing up to date, in realistic terms of today, the amounts which are spent in elections, and the ways in which the present law is made to function, notwithstanding the fact that it is archaic, and legalizing, in the sense of a Federal election, those practices, and also requiring those elements of disclosure with which we are so familiar as to accept them as almost axioms of government—as for example, in the Securities and Exchange Commission Act, the Taft-Hartley Act, the new labor law which we passed only last year, and a dozen other statutes.

In short, there is now thoroughly built into our legislative philosophy the idea that people are not wards of the legislators or anyone else. They are adults. If we give them information, we have the right to assume that they will use it wisely. If they do not, no government of our character will try to drag them or lead them around by the hand. But if we keep them in the dark, which would be the result of not passing the bill, we can hardly expect them to act as mature and educated citizens.

One final word. Something has been said about the fact that people ought to know who supports whom, as though that were a point of virtue. I know it was not thought of in that way, but I think it should be noted that it has been said to be a virtue to be supported by labor unions and not by banks; or, on the other hand, that it was a vice, in that if one were supported by labor unions he must be a wild-eyed radical, whereas if he were supported by bankers he would be a sound and very conservative fellow.

That situation is attributable to the fact that we do not have an effective law. I think the people of the United States can evaluate, in their own way, what all these things mean, and give them their proper weight when it comes to voting. But if we leave them in the dark, we only encourage all the mysteries which occur in dark places. How many people have we all heard who have said:

> You do not really know how much money is being poured into this campaign by the great bankers.

Then we meet with the great bankers, as we all do, and they tell us darkly:

> You cannot imagine how much money is being poured into the campaign by the loaded treasuries of the labor leaders and the labor unions.

Neither of these ideas should be given any substance unless it is supported by the facts. It seems to me that by common consent those of us who suffer under either set of mysteries, which are spread abroad and expected to be taken seriously by intelligent people, should favor a measure of this kind, which will at last be realistic. The realistic aspect of it, I will say to my friend from Missouri, is that it tries to gather up the totality of the contributions, instead of committing all the circumlocutions which have been piled upon those who run for office, and upon the very distinguished people who support them, because the law is simply out of date. The law should be brought up to date. It should be made inclusive, and it should be nondiscriminatory.

In order to accomplish all these things, we must pass the bill plus the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] and the Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING].

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Is it not true that if the public had a full, complete, and accurate understanding of the amount contributed by officials of labor unions, banks, and utilities, and if the reports were made in full by the various competing parties and candidates in primary elections, very likely the public would come to have a far clearer, better, and more approving attitude toward candidates than it has?

The Senator has referred to the dark rumor that labor is pouring hundreds of thousands of dollars into a campaign, or that banks or big oil companies are pouring enormous funds into a campaign. The Senator has said so well that it is the innuendo, rumor, or half-truth kind of situation which develops so unfortunately in a campaign which smears candidates, merely because the facts are not known. It seems to me that this kind of legislation, requiring disclosure, could eliminate that very unfortunate situation, which unfortunately colors the character of too many persons who are public officials or would be public officials, and lends a very sad aspect of evil and improper conduct, which too many people associate with political activity.

Mr. JAVITS. I thoroughly agree with my colleague. We ourselves often fall into the same error. Even in this discussion, for example, I have spoken of utilities, labor unions, and banks. So have others of our colleagues. As a matter of law, they are not permitted to contribute. They do not contribute. The contributions are made by individuals—directors or heavy investors in the companies. Yet the discussion becomes loaded with generalities, because we do not have an adequate accurate reporting system, and everything is left to the general observation of the people, because the specific facts are not clearly delineated and set forth, as would be required by this bill.

We are really doing something which is long overdue, and which seems so elementary that it is a little sad that we must spend so much time on the problem.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. HENNINGS. Does not the Senator from New York know that there were days in the Senate during the past century and early part of the present century when virtually every interest or business—manufacturing, banking, shipping, agriculture, and other interests—had its own Senators here?

Mr. JAVITS. That was popularly reputed to be the case.

Mr. HENNINGS. I will not mention the name of a great former Senator from the Senator's State, but a certain Senator was known as a New York Central Senator. He was a great after dinner raconteur. He was in the Senate for a long time.

There were others, whose names it would serve no useful purpose to remember. All one has to do is to read "The Robber Barons," or "The Age of the Moguls," together with a considerable amount of the history of the Senate. During that period no doubt there were Senators who were owned, body and soul, who were bought and paid for to look after certain interests. They performed their work well.

Mr. JAVITS. To make the discussion completely bipartisan, I know that the Senator will recall that certain Senators in those days were considered to be Southern Pacific Senators.

Mr. HENNINGS. Yes. The supreme court of my State was formerly referred to in terms of two divisions, namely, the division which represented the Frisco, and the division which represented the Missouri Pacific. That was many years ago, happily.

But there is no use in our being completely unsophisticated and naive about the fact that many people want someone here who will do their bidding.

If all the information is disclosed and becomes a matter of public information, the public may decide:

> Well, and good. We are happy to have that Senator in the Senate, because he is doing the bidding of a group of interests which are contributing to the welfare of the State. We believe he is a man who could control matters, and do such things as are best for the interests of the country.

We are not quarreling with the fact that there are contributions. We are trying to resolve the simple proposition, as the Senator has well said, that these facts should be made public. They should be a matter of public record, subject to public scrutiny, public observation, and understanding by the people who do the voting. The reason why there is no substantial debate on these points, and no substantial arguments against the provision relating to primaries, seems readily apparent.

I doubt not that if there were constitutional questions really involved, many of our Members would raise those questions; that if there were matters of Senate precedents, such as the election cases involved, those questions would be raised by our Members.

Therefore, the reluctance on the part of Senators to support the amendment regulating contributing and reporting of contributions can be fairly interpreted as meaning, as I have undertaken to say before—I believe the Senator from New York was not present—that it is none of the public's business.

Some of us believe it is, indeed, in very large part, the public's business, and that the public has a right to know, and wants to know, and has demanded for these many years to know. We believe that the proposed legislation is in the public interest and for the public benefit.

I thank the senior Senator from New York for his very able and thoughtful contribution to the discussion.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank my colleague.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from New York—because of his acute and long experience and because of his fine legal mind, as a former attorney general of the great State of New York, and a man whose brilliant legal career is well known—with respect to one argument which I have heard some of my colleagues make against the bill, namely, that it involves a matter of States rights; that while it is right for the Federal Government to regulate general elections, primary elections should be left up to the States, because the States have a peculiar interest in primary elections.

For the life of me I cannot grasp what principle is involved. A primary election for Federal office is a Federal election, not a State election. It is an election for Federal office in which, the Constitution states—in the case of the Senate—that the Senate shall be the judge of the qualifications of its Members.

Can the Senator from New York enlighten me as to what is the legal nature, at least, of the States rights argument which is being made against the proposed legislation?

Mr. JAVITS. The States rights argument is based on the premise that Senators are ambassadors of their States. That is completely contrary to the Constitution.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Why would not this argument apply also to general elections?

Mr. JAVITS. The Senator is exactly right. However, the concept is that although we have gotten away from the idea that a Senator is elected by the State legislature—and it took a constitutional amendment to provide for the direct election of Senators—there still persists the argument that when a Senator comes from his State he is an ambassador of his State; therefore the process of his coming to the final point of his appointment as ambassador is none of our business.

That is a completely artificial premise. The answer is overwhelmingly stated in the Classic case, to which my colleague has referred, and to which there have been so many references during the debate; namely, that there is an organic process of electing Senators and Representatives, part of which is their nomination in a primary, and the other part of that organic process is the result, to wit, their coming to the Senate; and that, therefore, the primary, just as the general election, is properly susceptible to the action of Congress.

Therefore we are dealing with a question of option, or a question of judgment. If we do include primaries by adopting the amendment, then these particular requirements would be applied to them. We are not obliged to pass every statute that is constitutional.

So the argument is answered on two grounds: First, the bill is without question constitutional; second, it is absolutely essential that the bill, if passed, be nondiscriminatory and do what it states to the public it will do, namely, include all elections.

Not only is the primary an organic element of the process, but it is also in some States the final selection process itself. Therefore it seems crystal clear to those of us who support that argument that the amendment must be adopted if the proposed legislation is to be meaningful at all. I thank my colleagues for their patience.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I shall support the amendment reported by the chairman of the committee, the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS].

I should like to make an observation or two about the procedures in the Senate. It has been said that legislative committees make policy in the Senate and that, accordingly, my party, at least, if not the opposite party, should press forward as the majority party in the Senate to enact legislation which is reported by a legislative committee.

Yet I would suggest that the proposed legislation now before the Senate has almost as good a case history as any could have to enable anyone to sustain the position that legislative committees cannot, will not, and do not make policy, in many instances.

A committee of nine very able Senators, after intense deliberations, have presented a bill which it reported unanimously, but which satisfies no one. It is a bill which I believe my good friend, the chairman of the committee, who has worked so hard in this matter, would be the first to admit is an inadequate bill, because he himself, the chairman of the committee, has brought to the floor three amendments, of which the pending amendment is one, intended drastically to rewrite on the floor a bill which I think he quite obviously considers inadequate in the form in which it comes from the committee.

He is joined by the distinguished senior Senator from Rhode Island in his effort to amend the bill on the floor, against a 5-to-4 vote of the committee of which he is the chairman.

An earlier bill presented by the distinguished chairman of the committee, also sponsored by the distinguished senior Senator from Rhode Island, carried in it—and I ask if this is not the case—the three provisions which the Senator from Missouri now seeks to insert by floor amendment.

Mr. HENNINGS. In reply to the able Senator from Pennsylvania, the 1957 bill did contain provisions relating to primaries. That bill was reported by the Committee on Rules and Administration, as I have said before in the debate. The bill before the Senate was reported after a number of amendments had been offered. It was reported in the hope that legislation would, as it has now, reach the floor for the purpose of debate and improvement by the process of amendment. Although the vote was very close on the amendment—5 to 4 in committee—the committee did reject the primary provision. I feel that the bill would be inadequate without such an amendment. I have felt that way since the beginning of my consideration of these matters back in about 1953, and during all of the time since then.

I hope that that, in some measure, at least, answers the question put to me by the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLARK. I thank the Senator from Missouri for his excellent clarification of this subject.

Now we find a situation in which two Democratic members of the committee and two Republican members of the committee join in submitting an important floor amendment. Their five colleagues—four Democrats and one Republican—do not join them in this request.

We are told that legislative committees make policy and that we in the majority party should support the legislative committees. Whom are we to support—the chairman and the Republicans who join him, or those Republicans and Democrats who do not join them? So I suggest that there still is a problem as to how my party can determine what policy it should follow on specific pieces of proposed legislation.

For that purpose, we scheduled a Democratic conference the other day. Unfortunately, other matters took so much time that when this bill was called before the conference for discussion, and although the chairman of the committee made a very able and a very short statement of what the bill was about, there was no opportunity to discuss it before the conference recessed. So now we are trying to make policy on the floor.

We have been told that we have no policy committee in the Democratic Party. I agree that that is the fact. We have what has been called a traffic committee or a listing committee, or, unhappy analogy, a rules committee in the sense of that in the other body, which schedules proposed legislation for floor action. But we have no policy committee, and it is said that we do not need one. I suggest that the pending bill is about as good evidence as we can get that we need a real policy committee; that we should have an opportunity to determine what the party policy on an important piece of proposed legislation of this sort should be. But we do not. Unfortunately, we were never able to get to the matter in conference.

In the absence of any definitive party policy on this matter, I, for one, turn to a pamphlet published on December 7, 1958, by the Democratic Advisory Council.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield before he comes to the last point?

Mr. CLARK. I am glad to yield.

Mr. PROXMIRE. It seems to me, in an attempt to pursue this very interesting suggestion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, that there are several things which Senators could do. They could say that the committee as a whole—a majority of the committee—should be viewed as a policy-recommending body—at least, to the Senate—and therefore if a majority of the committee decides on a certain course of action, that is a recommendation for the Democratic Senators, inasmuch as we have a substantial majority.

Mr. CLARK. I assume the Senator by his statement meant that if a majority of the Democrats on the committee voted a certain way, that would be our party policy. He could not have meant a majority of the Democratic Party.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I am wondering. This is a question which has never been answered by our friends who say we do not need a conference to arrive at a party policy; they say we do not need a policy committee to help us to arrive at party policy. We should not have to be that responsible or that unified. This is something we should not have to arrive at.

What puzzles me is that if we exclude the Republicans who are on that committee, and if we take the recommendation of the Democrats, we might conceivably arrive at some kind of recommendation. But I have never—and this is the third year in which I have served in the Senate—heard any Member of the Senate refer to the vote of a standing committee and say, "I feel that because it is the recommendation of the Democrats, because the Democrats on this committee voted 4 to 2 to follow a certain course, we should be constrained to pay attention to that action and to follow it."

Mr. CLARK. Would the Senator from Wisconsin agree that the proposal is untenable that legislative committees, in the present Senate at least, make party policy for our party?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I think it is, indeed, because there is in committee deliberations no opportunity to refer to any party position which the Democratic Party may have arrived at. There is no reference to any party platform; there is no consideration of any position taken by our great national leaders, our former President, or our nominee for President in the past. There is no reference to what the position of the leadership of the Senate, powerful, and able as it is, may be. There is no reference to anything of this kind.

The result is that a policy may be set by any kind of majority which can be put together. It may be a majority of unanimous Republicans and a small minority of Democrats. It may be almost any kind of a majority which comes forth with a conclusion or recommendation, whether it be yes or no.

I enthusiastically support the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, the chairman of the Committee on Rules and Administration. I think it carries great weight with all Senators. But I have no illusions about this. If a standing committee does not come forth with a majority recommendation, the chances of its passing in this body are enormously reduced. Whether we like it or not, it means that our policy is being made, in an effective way, by whatever majority can be put together on the bipartisan committee, which has no responsibility of any kind to party position. It has no reference, in discussions, or anything else, to actions or principles which have been arrived at by the Democratic Party.

Mr. CLARK. I find myself in complete accord with the Senator from Wisconsin. Having received no policy guidance from the committee itself, having had no opportunity to obtain policy guidance in the Democratic conference, and having received no expression of opinion from the leadership as to what it thinks the policy should be, I am constrained to turn to the only authority in the Democratic Party which has expressed, as a matter of policy, its views on this subject, namely, the Democratic Advisory Council, which, on December 7, 1958, published a pamphlet entitled "Democratic Task During the Next 2 Years."

I am constrained to give this policy statement of the advisory council a great deal of weight, indeed, because of two facts: First, that the advisory council is an official arm of the Democratic National Committee, created by it to advise on matters of policy during the 4 years between presidential elections. That, I believe, entitles the council to receive careful attention by all Democratic legislators in both bodies of Congress.

My second reason for paying careful attention to the recommendations of this group is the distinguished nature of its composition. I shall read for the RECORD only a few of the names of the members of the council who have given their approval to this statement by having their names printed on the flyleaf: W. Averell Harriman; Hubert H. Humphrey, the senior Senator from Minnesota; Estes Kefauver, the senior Senator from Tennessee; David L. Lawrence, Governor of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, whose views on this matter are particularly pertinent and important to me, as a Senator from that Commonwealth; Herbert H. Lehman, who served with great distinction for so long in this body; Adlai E. Stevenson, twice the Democratic standard bearer in the presidential contests of 1952 and 1956; the grand old man of the Democratic Party, one of the greatest Americans now alive, Harry S. Truman, former President of the United States; G. Mennen Williams, the distinguished Governor of Michigan; and as consultant, Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt.

The collective wisdom of this group and their many other colleagues on the committee does, I submit, Mr. President, carry great weight with me and, I believe, should carry great weight with my colleagues on this side of the aisle. What do they say——

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. May I complete my sentence? What do they say about the amendment proposed by the distinguished Senator from Missouri?

Now I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. PROXMIRE. It seems to me it is most significant that the Senator from Pennsylvania is doing what he is doing this afternoon. This is the first time, to my knowledge, it has been done. I think it is highly important. Many of us in the Senate have been asking for a long time for some opportunity to take part in determining policy for our party—a responsible policy.

The Senator from Pennsylvania has pointed out very well that we do not really have that opportunity. He has also pointed out that there is an eminent body of well-qualified, thoughtful, responsible, and very, very distinguished Americans who have assumed that responsibility. I welcome the way in which the Senator from Pennsylvania has called the attention of the Senate to the recommendations of these distinguished Democrats, who are an official body, and who do have a responsibility which they are willing to recognize, and who have met and have thoughtfully considered the matter, and, I may add, have tapped the best brains in the country—some of the outstanding leaders in our universities and elsewhere—in regard to issue after issue after issue, and now have come before the American people to make their recommendations in regard to the policies the Democratic Party should follow.

The fact that the Senator from Pennsylvania has pointed out that there is such a well-qualified body of Democrats who have taken a strong position on this proposed legislation is most important; and I believe that January 18, 1960, will go down—at least in my book—as a most important day, because of the fact that the Senator from Pennsylvania has called on Democrats in this body to recognize that the only group of nationally recognized Democrats who attempt to arrive at a thoughtful and responsible Democratic Party position is the advisory committee of the Democratic National Committee. This is party responsibility day, 1960.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Wisconsin for his comments, and I hope he has not overemphasized the importance of the comments I have made. Time alone will tell as to that.

Mr. President, I return to the question of what did the Democratic advisory committee say about the pending amendment, which has been offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS], on behalf of himself and the Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING]; what did the Democratic advisory committee say about it on December 7, 1958, when they published to the world the pamphlet entitled "The Democratic Task Force During the Next 2 Years?" They said:

> Clean elections law: The Federal election laws should be modernized along the lines proposed by the Hennings-Green bill, in order to assure more meaningful reporting of campaign expenditures and tightening of the corrupt practices laws and an extension of Federal regulation of elections for Federal office, to include primary elections for any Federal office.

Mr. President, that is so plain that there can be no doubt that the Democratic advisory committee, composed of many distinguished members of our party, and including an ex-President of the United States and our party's candidate for that high office in two separate elections, is 100 percent behind the effort of the chairman of the committee on privileges and elections to overrule a majority of his own committee and to call up, here on the floor of the Senate, an amendment which will comply with that suggestion by the Democratic advisory committee.

Mr. President, I intend to support the chairman of the committee on privileges and elections, and I intend to go down the line with the Democratic advisory committee.

I urge every Democratic Senator to follow the lead of that committee; and I hope and believe that the Senate leadership of the Democratic Party will also follow that lead. I hope they will make their position abundantly clear before we come to vote on this matter. If they have any reasons for not following that lead, I wonder whether they will be kind enough to state those reasons on the floor of the Senate, before this matter comes to a vote, so that we who wish, when possible, to bend over backwards in endeavoring to follow our duly elected leadership may have an opportunity to consider any views they may have which may happen to be in opposition to the views of the distinguished chairman of the committee [Mr. HENNINGS], who himself is a member of the Democratic leadership, since he serves as secretary of the Democratic caucus.

Mr. President, I have spoken longer than I intended. I shall not longer detain the Senate, except to say that the cogent reasons stated by the chairman of the committee [Mr. HENNINGS] and, indeed, also stated by the present occupant of the chair, the distinguished junior Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING], who comes from the other side of the aisle, in support of this amendment are, to my mind, so persuasive that it is difficult to understand why the Senate does not unanimously accept the amendment as being clearly in the public interest.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I desire to express my thanks, and also those of the rest of us who are associated in this endeavor, for the brilliant and apposite statement made by the most able Senator from Pennsylvania. He has raised some very challenging and some very thought-provoking questions.

I am glad to have him revive the 1958 statement of support by the Democratic advisory committee.

Some of us have been "in the trenches" for a good many years, in regard to this one bill and these amendments to it; and by "a good many years" I mean 7 or 8 years.

But now, here on the floor, we find virtually no opposition expressed from any source or quarter. Sometimes I feel that we are speaking out in the woods, and that perhaps we are hearing only the echo of our own voices.

If there are substantial reasons for opposition to this amendment, I think many of us believe we are equipped to debate the matter on the issues.

But if the reason for opposition is simply "Well, we do not want it; we do not like it; we do not want to regulate ourselves; we do not want anyone to tell us what to do, because we are the Senate; we may represent the people, but we do not want them to know about what we do to get here"—if such an attitude of cynicism is the general attitude on the part of those who are opposed to our proposals, not only would I say it is exceedingly disappointing, but I would also say that those who take that position are recreant in the performance of their duty to the people of the country.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield to me?

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I am happy to yield to the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLARK. I had the privilege of being on the floor last week when the distinguished senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] engaged in a colloquy with the able minority leader [Mr. DIRKSEN]. I do not believe that ever during my service in the Senate I have heard any Member go more quickly or better to the heart of any matter than did my friend, the Senator from Missouri, when, in one sentence, he said to the able minority leader that the issue is simply whether we want the people to know who contribute to our primary campaigns, or whether we want to keep that information secret. Certainly, that is clearly the issue.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that those of us who advocate the adoption of this amendment have not been engaging in legalistic expressions; neither have we been engaged in stating, here in this Chamber, sententious platitudes or in answering ourselves—already completely in agreement—by engaging in a process of repetition and redundancy.

No substantial argument against this proposed legislation has been offered in this Chamber. Yet, there seems to be going around word that there is a coalition between some Members on the other side of the aisle and some Members on this side of the aisle, and that that coalition will be able to defeat this amendment.

I may say that, to the best of my knowledge, no such group of Senators appeared before the committee prior to the time when it reported to the Senate a skeleton bill susceptible of amendment, and now in the course of being amended. It seems to me that here in the Senate Chamber there has not been any semblance of respectable opposition to the amendment on the basis of any claim that it lacks constitutionality.

We have had no persuasive argument on the basis of violation of States rights, or indeed of policy, except what seems to be a very durable core of stubborn opposition to telling the people the truth about what happens in primary elections. I do not think many would dare go so far as to say that we should not have to make any reports in general elections, although I cannot help but question whether some would not like to have all regulation of all elections relegated to limbo, because there are some people who just do not like any regulation whatsoever, be it traffic regulation, be it a criminal statute, be it a matter of public information given to the people of this country by public officers, or those seeking to be public officers, after or before their nominations at primaries or at conventions.

Mr. President, I shall be very brief. I had not intended to speak further on the amendment. The other day there was a smokescreen attempted by some Senators for the sole purpose of confusing and concealing the issues. I believe it necessary, in very brief fashion, to reply to it as a matter of record, not because of the stature of the arguments made or because of their persuasiveness or their cogency.

This floor today is singularly deserted by those who, I am sure, are prepared to come in when a vote is taken on this amendment and to vote in opposition to it. However, the names will be recorded, and the people of this country will know who, of the Senators representing them, wish to continue to operate in the dark and to attain nomination in a political party by means not requiring full and public disclosure.

We have heard arguments about this being selection and not an election, and about preemption and election areas not being covered by the bill or the amendment.

The argument that it is selection, not election, is, indeed, a nice distinction. However, in a good many State elections we know selection means election, as has been said many times. In many States where this situation exists, I would not like to tell the victorious nominee that he had not been through an election, but only a selection. I believe the comments of the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] are more than enough to prove that a nominee in his State has been elected.

The sole question before us is, Do we believe the people should be informed as to campaign financing in primary elections, caucuses, and conventions? As has been said repeatedly on this floor during the course of this discussion, primaries are an integral part of the election process, for no candidate, of course, can be elected to a congressional seat unless he is placed on the ticket by victory in the primary process, be it election, caucus, or convention.

In the general election, the people must choose between the candidates on the ballot. Therefore, it is impossible to separate the general election and the primary process. We have again the authority of the leading case in 1941, United States against Classic, from which I had intended to read further, but that has already been done by my able colleague from New York. I have read parts of it, and may again advert to it tomorrow. The Congress has taken this attitude in election contests, and the courts have taken this attitude in cases before them—that the primary is a part of the election process.

It has also been argued that it would be a paradox if primaries had to be conducted under both State law and Federal law. If such is a paradox, that paradox exists today, because under existing law, the Corrupt Practices Act, the Hatch Act, and other Federal statutes control phases of general elections. However, each State also has laws controlling who can vote and where. Even in primary elections today we have dual control. Certainly, the Taft-Hartley Act, relating to contributions or expenditures by national banks, corporations, or labor organizations, is the law pervasive throughout all States of the Union.

I now ask unanimous consent to insert at this point in the RECORD title 18 of the United States Code, section 610, being that portion of the United States Code relating to contributions or expenditures by national banks, corporations, or labor organizations under the Taft-Hartley Act.

There being no objection, the section was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TITLE 18, UNITED STATES CODE

SEC. 610. Contributions or expenditures by national banks, corporations, or labor organizations.

It is unlawful for any national bank, or any corporation organized by authority of any law of Congress, to make a contribution or expenditure in connection with any election to any political office, or in connection with any primary election or political convention or caucus held to select candidates for any political office, or for any corporation whatever, or any labor organization to make a contribution or expenditure in connection with any election at which presidential and vice-presidential electors or a Senator or Representative in, or a Delegate or Resident Commissioner to Congress are to be voted for, or in connection with any primary election or political convention or caucus held to select candidates for any of the foregoing offices, or for any candidate, political committee, or other person to accept or receive any contribution prohibited by this section.

Every corporation or labor organization which makes any contribution or expenditure in violation of this section shall be fined not more than $5,000; and every officer or director of any corporation, or officer of any labor organization, who consents to any contribution or expenditure by the corporation or labor organization, as the case may be, and any person who accepts or receives any contribution, in violation of this section, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both; and if the violation was willful, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than two years, or both.

For the purposes of this section "labor organization" means any organization of any kind, or any agency or employee representation committee or plan, in which employees participate and which exist for the purpose, in whole or in part, of dealing with employers concerning grievances, labor disputes, wages, rates of pay, hours of employment, or conditions of work. (June 25, 1948, ch. 645, sec. 1, 62 Stat. 723; May 24, 1949, ch. 139, sec. 10, 63 Stat. 90; Oct. 31, 1951, ch. 655, sec. 20(c), 65 Stat. 718.)

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, as has been said before, the Hatch Act limits contributions to $5,000 to any candidate or political committee in a calendar year. Therefore, if dual control is a paradox, it has existed, indeed, for many years.

Another one of the arguments presented, in some fashion or other, to prevent the extension of reporting and disclosure to primaries is that the bill, even with this extension, does not go far enough, in that it does not require reports from State and local committees. This is the strangest argument I have heard against extending the bill to cover primaries. In preceding days, although not today, we have had some weird or singular arguments raised in opposition to this amendment.

I would agree that failure to require reports from such committees may be a weakness, but the solution to a weakness in another section of the bill is not to oppose the amendment on primaries, but to support it and also support an amendment to include such committees.

As I said in my opening remarks on Wednesday, I advised the Senate that at the appropriate time, after consideration of the pending amendment, I proposed to offer an amendment to extend the bill to cover State and local committees. The adoption of this amendment I believe would be a solution to the weakness which some have pointed out.

Another argument raised is that where the new expenditure limitations disagree with expenditure limitations under State law, doubt may arise as to which one controls, and a State secretary of state might refuse to certify an election because the victorious candidate had expended more than the State limitation.

I am unable to determine exactly what this argument has to do with this amendment on primaries because it goes to the certification of the winner of a general election, but, nevertheless, the answer is simple, if we are going to undertake to answer it, and I think we should, because the minority leader himself raised the question the other day.

Section 210 of the bill is titled "Effect on State Laws," and in this section, the bill specifically states:

That the limitations on expenditures prescribed in section 207 shall supersede any such limitations prescribed in State laws which differ therefrom.

This provision is simple and direct. There can be no question as to the intent of Congress. In the area of expenditure limitations, the Federal law controls, and supersedes State law.

Mr President, as I said earlier, the question of preemption has been brought up, again by the able minority leader, who said that it did not make any difference whether the committee reported the bill unanimously or not. We sometimes think in the Judiciary Committee, where we serve together, that reporting a bill unanimously is a rather important and most unusual achievement. It has been suggested that because the amendment would bring primaries within the purview of the law and would regulate expenditures and require reporting respecting primaries, the courts might hold that the Federal Government had preempted the whole field of regulation of primaries. The answer to this is manyfold.

First, Congress regulated the same activities with respect to general elections by the passage of the Corrupt Practices Act in 1925 and the courts have not so ruled during the 35 years this creaking, archaic 1925 act has been in effect.

Second, as I mentioned before, the bill contains a specific provision as to preemption. The distinguished Senator from Arkansas has long worked diligently for the passage of a bill which would govern preemption on a general basis. I, conversely, have long opposed passage of such a bill, because it would cut across the whole area of Federal law with one swoop without regard to the past inteent of Congress.

This matter was debated in the closing days of the Congress preceding this, when it was defeated by a margin of one vote. I refer to S. 3, and the so-called McClellan-Bridges amendment.

Mr. President, I have always believed that Congress must determine specifically in every area of the law if it has the power to preempt, and, if it desires to preempt, then Congress should spell it out in clear, unmistakable, and unequivocal language, so that in interpreting the law the courts will know the legislative history and the intent of Congress.

However, we cannot today pass a bill in broad terms covering all past legislation. The result would be chaos. The bill of the Senator from Arkansas on preemption in its first provision sets out that—

No act of Congress shall be construed as indicating an intent on the part of Congress to occupy the field in which such act operates, to the exclusion of any State laws on the same subject matter unless such act contains an express provision to that effect, or unless there is a direct and positive conflict between such act and the State law so that the two cannot be reconciled or consistently stand together.

Section 210 of the bill before the Senate provides:

This act shall not be construed to annul or to exempt any candidate from complying with the laws of any State relating to the nomination or election of candidates unless such laws are directly inconsistent with the provisions of this act: Provided, That the limitations on expenditures prescribed in section 207 shall supersede any such limitations prescribed in State laws which differ therefrom.

I do not think there can be any question as to the intent of the Congress, following that language and its interpretation, with respect to the so-called doctrine of preemption.

Question has been raised because certain expenditures of a candidate, such as assessments, fees, or charges levied upon a candidate by a State; necessary personal, traveling, or subsistence expenses and cost of stationery, postage, writing, or printing—other than billboards or newspapers—distributing letters, circulars, posters, and telegraph or telephone service, are not to be included in determining whether the candidate's expenditures have exceeded the limitation. The present law—the Corrupt Practices Act, so called—also excludes these expenditures from this computation, and the committee agreed to keep these exclusions. However, under both the present law and the bill of 1959, these expenditures must be reported by the candidate.

Again we get back to the essence, to the gravamen of the bill, which is the reporting, which is indispensable, so that the people will know the amount of such expenditures. This certainly is the heart and soul of the proposed legislation.

The question of precedents has also been raised. The Congress has already enacted legislation controlling activities in primaries. Under the Taft-Hartley Act, corporations, national banks, and labor unions cannot contribute or expend money to influence primaries or general elections. Under the Hatch Act, a person cannot contribute over $5,000 to any candidate or committee in a calendar year to influence the nomination or election of a candidate. Therefore, the precedent is there. This amendment would extend Federal control in this area, but some of us believe it is very significant to recognize the extent of Therefore, the control provided by this bill if the amendment is adopted. Primarily, the bill calls for disclosure. It requires that the people be informed. Therefore, the control provided by this bill will not come from the Federal Government, but from the people, when they are informed as to the amount of money spent and from where it came.

I have said before, and I believe it worth repeating, the sole question before the Senate is, Are we to inform the people respecting campaign financing or are we to operate in the dark, in secrecy, in a subterranean manner? I ask, What do Members of the Senate have to fear from informing the people as to campaign financing in primaries?

That question has been asked many times in the course of this debate, and to this time, Mr. President, the silence of this Chamber has remained unbroken by any answer to that very direct, very simple question, which relates only to common sense and, to human experience; which is not legalistic; which does not transcend, interfere with, or in any wise impinge upon State law, the decisions of the Supreme Court, or the precedents of the Senate in determining the qualifications of its own Members.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p.m.) the Senate adjourned until tomorrow, Tuesday, January 19, 1960, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate January 18, 1960:
